But there is the smaller farmer, the man who has not made sufficient in four or five years, that he might comfortably retire if he felt like it. There are many of them in all the three Provinces. It is not the less to his credit that he has earned his homestead by the three years residence, that he is free from debt, and has a reasonable bank account. He, too, came to the country handicapped by debts, and with very little means. He is contented, has a good home, land free of encumbrance, some stock, and with good prospects. One of these writes: "I formerly lived near Dayton, Ohio, on a rented farm, had as good a chance as the average renter, but after ten years of hard work, satisfied myself that if I ever expected to secure a home, I would have to undertake something else. Hearing of Western Canada, I investigated, and seven years ago last Spring settled in a homestead and purchased (on time) an adjoining half section, arriving with a carload of household effects and farm implements, including four horses and three cows, and $1,800 in money—my ten years' work in Ohio.

"The first year our crops gave us feed, the second year 100 acres of wheat gave us $1,800; no failure of crop since starting here. I have now 22 head of horses, 15 head of cattle, and 35 hogs. We own 1,120 acres of land, and have same all under cultivation. Was offered at one time $35.00 per acre for a half section where we live, and all the other land could be sold today on present market at $30.00 per acre. Should we care to dispose of our holdings, could pay all debts and have over $30,000 to the good, but the question is where could we go to invest our money and get as good returns as here?

"We have equally as good, if not better prospects for crops this year, as we had three years ago, when our wheat reached from 30 to 48 bushels per acre. I never believed such crops could be raised until I saw them myself. I had 15 acres that year that made 50 bushels to the acre. Our harvest will be ready by the 12th. We have this season in crop 400 acres of wheat, 125 of oats, 90 of flax, and run three binders, with four men to do the stooking.

"We certainly like this country, and the winters, although the winters are cold at times, but we do not suffer as one would think. What we have accomplished here can be duplicated in almost any of the new districts. If anyone doubts anything I have said in this letter, tell them to come here, and I can prove every word I have written."

The name of the writer can be had from the Superintendent of Immigration, Ottawa, Canada, who can give the names of hundreds of others equally successful. Adv.

Liquid Measure.

It was the time of the singing lesson at the local council school, and the teacher was explaining to the young hopefuls that if a "treble," and "alto," a "tenor" and a "bass" sung together, their united efforts would constitute a quartet.

There seemed no trouble about that, and the teacher thought the class was getting on very nicely.

"Now, Jimmy, leave off pinching your brother's leg and listen to me," said she. "If a bass and tenor sang together, what would you call that?"

Jimmy was the son of the local milkman, and a bright lad withal. His answer was not long in coming.

"Please, miss," said he, "that would be a 'pintette.'"

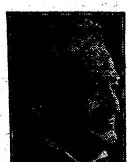
Pe-ru-na and Ka-tar-no



S. B. Hartman, M. D.

I have received a letter from a young lady, who asks me: "Is the old Pe-ru-na (Ka-tar-no) better than the revised Pe-ru-na?"

Either medicine has its place. One is adapted for one condition, another for another. Ka-tar-no is a better remedy for some conditions than the revised Pe-ru-na. On the other hand, the revised Pe-ru-na is a better remedy for some conditions than Ka-tar-no. They are both intended as catarrh remedies. They have both done a great work in relieving catarrh, chronic and acute. Many hundreds of cases of chronic catarrh have recovered while taking Ka-tar-no and the same is true of the revised Pe-ru-na during the last six years since its revision.

There is a difference, however, in the two remedies. Whenever catarrh is associated with constipation then the revised Pe-ru-na is the best. Indeed, this is exactly why the revision was made, to meet such cases. But where no laxative is needed, where the bowels are regular or inclined to be loose, then the old Pe-ru-na (Ka-tar-no) is the better remedy.

Pe-ru-na, Man-a-lin and La-cu-pia manufactured by the Pe-ru-na Company, Columbus, Ohio. Sold at all drug stores.

SPECIAL NOTICE—Many persons inquire for The Old-time Peruna. They want the Peruna that their Fathers and Mothers used to take. The old Peruna is now called Katarno. If your druggist or dealer does not keep it for sale write the Katarno Company, Columbus, Ohio, and they will tell you all about it.

DIPLOMATS LEAVE CONSTANTINOPLE

GRECIAN REPRESENTATIVE QUITS SULTAN'S DOMAIN WITH THE ALLIED MINISTERS.

DOCTORS SOW MICROBES.

Turkish Physicians Reported Doing so on Hellenic Frontier—Heaviest Fighting Promises to Be Around Adrianople.

Constantinople, Oct. 21.—An official report says the Greek army has attacked the Turkish near Meluna Pass and that the battle continues. The place is on the north coast of Greece.

London.—Many miles of railway between Uskup and Salonika have been destroyed and telephone lines cut and bridges dynamited, according to a dispatch to the Telegraph from Sofia, Bulgaria.

Turkey's endeavors to detach Greece from the confederation of Balkan states have failed. Greece has declared war against the Ottoman empire; all the allied ministers have left Constantinople, and the allied states have notified the powers in a note detailing their complaints that a state of war with Turkey exists.

Reports of fighting, such as the capture of Prestina by the Servians and of a heavy battle at Mustaff Pacha, probably are in advance of the real facts.

There has been for some time an active censorship of military news in all the near Eastern capitals and little is known of the dispositions of the various forces. All reports of fighting, therefore, need to be received with a measure of caution, as it is not improbable they are spread abroad from interested motives.

Adrianople Center of Struggle.

The greatest struggle will be for possession of Adrianople, the capture of which by the Bulgarians would leave the road open to Constantinople.

Engagement Near Kirk-Kilesse.

Constantinople.—Heavy fighting is reported to have been in progress in the region about Kirk-Kilesse northeastward of Adrianople. Large forces were engaged on both sides.

The departure from Constantinople of the Balkan ministers was not attended by any hostile demonstration. M. Saratoff, the Bulgarian minister and M. Gryparis the Greek minister, embarked in steamers bound respectively for Varna and Piraeus, while Dr. J. Nenadovitch, the Servian representative sailed for Kustenje.

With the exception of a few windows being broken during the departure of the ministers no other disagreeable incident is reported.

Turkey Tries to Placate Greece.

Doubt prevailed up to the last moment whether Greece finally would throw in her lot with the Balkan allies. It is an unquestionable fact that the Turkish government made serious efforts to have Greece withdraw her allegiance to the confederation.

CHEMIST UNCONSCIOUS.

Federal Expert Probably Robbers' Victim.

St. Paul, Oct. 21.—Dr. George E. Goode, supervising chemist of the marine hospital service, Washington, D. C., was found unconscious at Ninth and Rosadel streets and remained for hours in a comatose condition. The police are inclined to believe that Dr. Goode had been waylaid and robbed, as a leather case in which he carried valuable papers belonging to the United States government, was missing. No trace of it has been found. They also point to the fact that no money or watch was found on his person at the time he was found in the street, which would hardly be likely for a man of Dr. Goode's prominence.

The locality in which he was found is an obscure part of the city, outside the residence district, and the police are at a loss to understand how he came to be there unaccompanied. Many theories have been advanced as to how he came to be in this part of the city, but none seems plausible to the police except that he was possibly lured there for the purpose of robbery.

Breeze Scatters $115,000.

Minneapolis, Oct. 21. — A frisky breeze whisking around the corner of the Chamber of Commerce building caused a $115,000 rain. If the $115,000 had been generally negotiable, several persons could have been much richer than they are now. But the money was in checks, all indorsed, and payable to the Minnesota Grain company, 66 Chamber of Commerce building. The grain company stands to lose nothing, and finders of the checks will be no richer. The vagrant breeze caught the checks, folded loosely in a bankbook.

Modern Woodmen Enjoined.

Chicago, Oct. 21.—Judge McKinley in the superior court issued a temporary injunction, restraining the officers of the Modern Woodmen of America from submitting to a referendum vote of the members of the society the question of the repeal of increased rates in effect since January.

Bingham, Utah, Oct. 21.—Work at the Utah Copper company mines is rapidly approaching normal condition.

ROOSEVELT PASSES A CRISIS

PERIOD OF BLOOD POISONING HAS EXPIRED.

Tetanus, Pneumonia or Plurisy Are Now Remote Possibilities.

Chicago, Oct. 21. — While Colonel Roosevelt's physicians were careful to say that their patient was not yet out of danger, they are distinctly optimistic. The passage of the day brought an end to the period within which symptoms of blood poisoning were to be looked for.

Colonel Roosevelt's condition was virtually unchanged, with no indications of the development of sepsis, the one thing most feared. There still remain the possibility of complications in the shape of tetanus, pneumonia or pleurisy. But with the danger of blood poisoning remote, it was felt that the chances were greatly in favor of rapid recovery.

Colonel Roosevelt's physicians said that while they believed that the colonel's desire to leave for New York could be gratified, it would be necessary for him to be extremely careful to avoid over-fatigue during the journey. They told him at the outset that if he returned home so soon he must keep strictly to himself during the trip, and that there must be no attempts at speechmaking while he was on the journey.

The colonel said he hoped the people at the towns along the line of travel would not come out with the expectation of seeing him, for it would be impossible for him even to leave his stateroom to go to the platform.

The first vivid impressions of Colonel Roosevelt on the night on which he was shot down in Milwaukee were related from the colonel's own lips.

What seemed to impress Colonel Roosevelt most strongly was not the shooting itself—he seemed to accept that as a thing of the past, to be dismissed once it was over—but rather his hour on the stage of the Milwaukee auditorium, when he was speaking with a bullet in his side. But he insisted that to make the speech was only what any other man would have done under the circumstances.

"It was nothing—nothing," he said. "I felt a little pain, but it was not severe. When I stretched out my arm, or reached for my manuscript, it made me gasp a bit, but that was all."

LESSEN X-RAY DANGER.

Parisian Physician Completes Experiment.

Paris, Oct. 21.—A discovery that is expected to remove the danger to which manipulators of the x-ray have been subjected in its handling has been announced at the academy of sciences by M. L. G. Droit.

In his experiments M. Droit was impressed with the remarkable capacity of silk while being dyed to absorb considerable quantities of metallic substances. With the aid of two silk manufacturers, he succeeded in getting a piece of silk heavily absorbed with lead and other substances which proved impenetrable armor against the rays. One piece of silk thus charged weighs 266 grams to the square meter. With six thicknesses of this silk M. Droit fashioned a short glove which he has used successfully in handling x-rays. The gloves possesses the double advantage of suppleness and protection against the rays.

Mexicans Burning Bridges.

Washington, Oct. 21.—In order to keep in closer touch with the situation at the rebel invested city of Vera Cruz and along the Gulf coast of Mexico, the navy department which Thursday recalled the cruiser Des Moines, proceeding towards Progresso to return to Vera Cruz, directed Commander Edward H. Durell of the cruiser Tacoma. More than 30 bridges along the Northwestern railroad have been burned by rebels.

Swindler Given Sentence.

La Crosse, Wis., Oct. 21. — Prof. Harry Daverkosen of Janesville, who is on trial in the United States court here charged with using the mails to defraud and against whom 40 alleged victims were brought to testify, pleaded guilty to the charge and was fined $1,000 and sentenced to six months in the Rock county jail in Janesville.

Secretary Wilson to Stump For Taft.

BADLY BURNED ON LEG

200 Fuller St., Redwood, Cal.—"My two-year-old daughter tipped a basin of hot water on her leg between knee and ankle. She was burned so badly, in places as large as a man's hand, that the skin was loose. The appearance of the leg was dark red. I applied the Cuticura Ointment at once and put on a bandage. I removed the bandage twenty-four hours later, opened the water blisters, applied more Cuticura Ointment and bandaged again. The skin did not come off and I did this until she was completely cured. I did not let her walk much until it was healed. She did not complain after the first day, and after the Cuticura Ointment was put on, slept as usual. The scars are gone; Cuticura Ointment entirely cured her." (Signed) Mrs. E. O. Chapman, Mar. 12, 1912.

Published every Friday at Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota.

Subscription Price: $1.00 per year, strictly in advance.

Entered as second-class matter Sept. 22, 1911, at the post office at Holt, Minnesota, under the act of March 3, 1879.

The friendship of the trusts for Roosevelt is shown plainly by the attempts of the magnates to convince the public that he was elected in 1904 by funds contributed by them. If he were at all likely to be under their influence at this time, the aforesaid magnates would most strenuously deny that they had ever given a cent to aid his former election.

According to a straw vote being taken by the Duluth Herald and the results of which that paper has been publishing for the past twelve days, Roosevelt is the favorite candidate among the readers of that paper. The Herald is the most radical democratic sheet in the state, and it has crowed lustily because Wilson showed the greatest strength in the early days of this straw vote. In The figures yesterday Roosevelt leads and Wilson takes second place. The figures shown are; Roosevelt, 783; Wilson, 666. Debs, 304; Taft, 292; Chafin, 26. Oh, yes, Roosevelt is losing every day to Taft—so the city papers say.

P. W. Collins, the great misfortune of the Progressive party in this state, tried to create a prejudice against P. M. Ringdahl among the Scandinavian clergymen because of Mr. Ringdahl's religious views. Some irresponsible newspapers had branded Ringdahl as an atheist, and Collins tried to get the preachers to take the mattir up and discuss it from their pulpits. Mr. Ringdahl answered the charge by stating that his religious views were based mostly on the "Sermon on the Mount" and some of the Commandments, but that his relations with the Supreme being were too sacred to be made the subject of partizan political discussion. Mr. Ringdahl's religion has been such as to enable him to lead a clean life, and at the same time do something far his fellow men. Can Mr. Collins say as much? We doubt it.

I am a non-partizan candidate for Judge of Probate for Marshall County. I am a resident of the eastern part of the county, where I am now engaged in farming, but have been a teacher in the schools of this county for nine years.

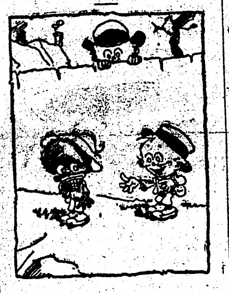
SOLDIERS ENJOYED A FEAST

Cleverness Really Deserved Leniency With Which the Grand Duke Treated the Affair.

An amusing story of an incident at a masked ball given at the capital of one of the smaller German principalities is being told in Berlin. The rule was printed upon the invitation cards that everyone must come either in fancy dress or in a black domino. In one of the rooms of the court a buffet had been set out, and the attendants there soon come to remark the unusually active appetite of one guest, duly masked and cloaked, who consumed extraordinarily large quantities of the more expensive delicacies and wines. After several minutes of vigorous eating he would leave the buffet and disappear among the throng of dancers. Soon, however, he would be back again, his appetite apparently as strong as ever. After the fourth visit at short intervals of this hungry guest the head waiter called the attention of the master of ceremonies, who waited at the buffet until the masked stranger once more returned. He was again served with a full supply of food and wine, and as he turned away was politely asked to show his invitation card. At this some confusion was noticed in his bearing, and the master of ceremonies requested him to remove his mask and cloak. To the astonishment of the servants and the amusement of the guests there was revealed the shamefaced figure of one of the soldiers of the guard on duty in the hall below. The guard had found a spare domino lying in the hall and they had been putting it on one after the other during the evening, so as to be able to go boldly into the ballrooms and eat their fill at the buffet unchallenged. So amused at the story was the grand duke that he refused to allow the greedy soldiers to be punished.

JOY FOR EPH



"Say, Eph, run in and borrow your ma's clothesline, an' we'll play a new game—it's called lynchin'!"

NEXT!

The barber's shop was well patronized, when in walked a shabby stranger.

"Good morning, sir!" called the barber doubtfully.

"Good morning!" replied the stranger. "My good man, will you shave one side of my face for a penny?"

The barber winked at his waiting customers. "Certainly," he replied: "Take a seat, please."

Presently it was the shabby stranger's turn to occupy the seat of honor. "Now, which side shall I shave?" asked the barber, as he waved his lathering brush in the air.

"The outside!" replied the shabby stranger, meekly.—Tit-Bits.

PROPER REJOINDER.

Wilkins was an enthusiastic golfer, and when his friend Johnson met him coming away from the links a day or two ago he was in a terrible frame of mind. "What's happened, old fellow?" asked Johnson amiably. "Everything's happened!" growled Wilkins. "It's enough to make one give up golf and go in for fishing. That ass Fitznoodle has been running all over the course, and actually crossed my tee just as I was about to make a lovely drive. What would you have done had you been in my place?" "Well," he replied, with a smile, "seeing that he crossed your 't' I think I would have dotted his 'i.'"

THE RESPONSIBLE ONE.

In Self-Protection

(Editorial.)

If you were hiring a man to work on your farm, would you hire a man you knew little or nothing about or one that you knew personally to be thoroughly competent and reliable and whose own interests would be best served by his serving you well? Would you refuse to hire such a man because the color of his hair differed from your own?

The voters of eastern Marshall County know John A Sorum. They know that he is thoroughly qualified to fill the office of sheriff, and that his own interests are a part of eastern Marshall bounty. What do they know of Mr. Forsberg other than that he has managed to hold office for a dozen years or more and always claims to "need" it for "just one more term?"

Every voter in the eastern part, in self-protection, should try to secure ample representation on the list of county officials, and, in every case where the candidate is qualified to fill the office, and worthy of it, the eastern man should get the votes. He will watch our interests, and a part of his earnings, at least, may be spent to help develop this territory.

Tardiness is quite the proper thing judging from the amount recorded to date. Allowance being made for inevitable tardiness, the fact remains that there is more of it than conditions warrant.

Harry Heinze, Johnny Hoel, Francis Coppay and Gerald Ryan are among the most recently enrolled.

There may be some reasons for anonymous authorship in special cases, but there seems to be no good reason for anonymous manufacturing, yet, notwithstanding, it appears to be practised a great deal, so much so that a bill was introduced in the last congress which provides that every article placed upon the market for interstate or foreign commercec shall bear the name and address of the manufacturer under a penalty of a fine not exceeding $1,000.00, or six months' imprisonment, or both. Why should not that also be a wholesome provision for domestic commerce to protect our own people, as so many articles are now being offered under private brands without the maker's name, and therefore cannot be determined to what class they belong?

GOT RICH IN THREE YEARS

EXPERIENCES OF A BRITISH IMMIGRANT IN CANADA-WEST.

The following straightforward statement needs no comment to add to its force and effect. It appears in a recent issue of the Liverpool Mercury.

H. Patterson, of Nutana, Saskatchewan, Canada, when he arrived from Liverpool, had "Six of us to support," to use his own phraseology, and his funds were getting low. He secured a homestead 32 miles out from Sundurn, and started living on it April 15, 1907. The previous fall he put all his money, $137, into a shack and lot, making sure of a home. As cook and caterer in a local hotel he made $75 a month, and out of this had some savings out of which he paid his breaking and improvements on the homestead. The shack was sold to good advantage. Then Mr. Patterson tells the story after he had removed his family to the homestead:

"For the first month life was so strange and new that I hadn't time to think of anything, only fixing up our new home. I was so 'green' to farm life that I didn't know the difference between wheat and oats (I do now)! Between working out, cropping my place, and with my gun, we managed to live comfortably for the three years, which time was required to put in my duties. I had accumulated quite a stock of horses, cows, pigs, fowls, and machinery in the three years.

"In October, 1909, I secured my patent to my land, so took a few days' holidays to Saskatoon to locate a purchased homestead (viz., 12s. per acre) from the Government. Instead of getting the purchased homestead, I secured a half section (320 acres) on the Saskatchewan River for $25 per acre on easy terms, nine years' payments with a cash payment of $1,000. I mortgaged my first homestead, obtained chattel mortgages on my stock, and on December 24th, 1909, took possession; on June 10, 1910, I sold out again for $40 per acre, clearing, besides my crop (140 acres), $4,800. I also sold my first homestead, clearing $1,800 and two Saskatoon town lots, which we value at $1,000 each today. We placed all our capital in another farm (river frontage) and some trackage lots (60), also a purchased homestead (river frontage). I remained as Manager of the Farm I had sold on a three years' contract at a fine salary and house, garden, and numerous privileges.

"So by the time my three years have expired, with my investments and the increased value of my frontage and lots, I am hoping to have a clear profit on my $137 investment of $50,000. My land doesn't eat anything, it is nearly all paid for. I hold a good position (and secure)"—Adv.

QUEER MAN TRIES TO SEE COLONEL

PERSISTENT, THOUGH HARMLESS APPEARING, STRANGER TRIES FOR ADMISSION.

PLANS TO GUARD LIFE.

To Protect Roosevelt Till Well—Believed He Will Be Able to Speak In New York Wednesday.

Oyster Bay, N. Y., Oct. 28.—On account of a number of threatening letters received by Colonel Roosevelt, and the presence in Oyster Bay of a stranger who attempted to make his way into the colonel's house, steps have been taken to guard the life of the former president. A tentative decision was reached to engage one or two men to protect Colonel Roosevelt during the remainder of the campaign and for a time thereafter if the colonel has not recovered sufficiently by election day to be able to defend himself.

Colonel Roosevelt's condition continues to improve and his physicians say he will be able to speak at the Madison Square Garden meeting in New York on Wednesday night, if no unforeseen complications arise, but they said that he would be unable to do any further campaigning.

The man who attempted to see Colonel Roosevelt arrived in Oyster Bay and set out on foot for Sagamore Hill. He was met at the door by the colonel's secretary and insisted that he must see the former president, although told that no visitors were being received.

Visitor Persistent.

He was a tall, well dressed man, with a flowing black moustache and a sombrero, which gave him the appearance of a westerner. He would give no reason for asking to see the colonel, but persisted in his demands until he was cut off sharply and told to leave Sagamore Hill. He then asked to see Mrs. Roosevelt. The colonel's secretary finally persuaded him that it was useless and he went away.

There was nothing about the man's manner to suggest that he would attempt violence, and he was described by those who saw him as being apparently harmless.

The stranger returned to the village and wrote a long, rambling letter to Colonel Roosevelt. Then he disappeared. No trace of him could be found in Oyster Bay later and it was not known whether he had left.

Cranks Stirred Up.

The attempt on Colonel Roosevelt's life was said by Dr. George W. Faller of Oyster Bay, one of the colonel's physicians, to have stirred up cranks and to be responsible for the letters which Colonel Roosevelt has received since his return to Oyster Bay. In some of them threats have been made against the colonel and it was decided that the danger of another attempt to assassinate him was sufficient to make it necessary to guard him.

The colonel's physicians wish to have him get out of doors as soon as possible, believing that he will be benefited greatly by doing so, but they are unwilling to risk the chance of another attack. It is probable that he will be kept in the house until adequate protection has been provided.

Colonel Roosevelt's only visitors yesterday were George W. Perkins, Frank A. Munsey and William H. Hotchkiss, New York state Progressive chairman.

GOV. WILSON EXPLAINS.

Declares $12,500 McCormick Donation Was Returned.

Princeton, N. J., Oct. 28.—Governor Woodrow Wilson, in explaining a speech of Wm. J. Bryan in Michigan, with reference to a pre-convention contribution of $12,500 by Cyrus H. McCormick, declared that this money had been returned to Mr. McCormick by Cleveland H. Dodge. The governor said he had not been consulted in the transaction and that it took place within the last 10 days.

Governor Wilson said he did not know of Mr. McCormick's contribution to his pre-convention fund until after he had been nominated. The governor said Mr. McCormick's contribution was made as one of a group of "Princeton friends," from whom Mr. Dodge obtained support for the Wilson candidacy.

Election Districts Increased.

New York, Oct. 28.—On account of the heavy registration for the approaching election due to the increase in population throughout the city of New York and the keen interest taken in the contests this year, 55 new election districts have been added in the assembly districts throughout the city.

Party Born at Winona.

Winona, Minn., Oct. 28.—That Winona is the birthplace of the National Progressive party was the statement of John M. Parker, prominent New Orleans Democrat, aligned with the Roosevelt followers, in an address in this city. He asserted that when President Taft delivered his famous Winona tariff speech he uttered the words that started the growth of the Progressives. The seed sown then budded last June at Chicago. Mr. Parker's address was delivered at the first local Progressive rally.

HE WAS TAKING NO CHANCES

Small Boy's Precautions May Have Been Excessive, but He Still Had the Suit.

The Rev. John N. Underwood, one of Pittsburg's most eloquent and earnest ministers, said the other day: "In a temperance address in the spring I pointed out that drunken husbands kill, every year, with revolvers and hatchets and clubs, 3,600 wives. That 2,500 babies are killed by drunken fathers who crush them in bed. That 80 per cent. of all our divorces are due to drunkenness."

Mr. Underwood paused, then added: "I heard recently of a little boy to whom a warm and comfortable suit had been given. The boy's father was a drunkard, and it was feared that the suit would soon find its way to the pawnshop. But a week after the lad had got the suit he was still wearing it.

"'Good for you, Johnny!' said a city missionary to the little chap. 'Still wearing your suit, I see.'

"'Yes, sir,' the urchin explained. 'I sleep in it.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

ITCHING AND BURNING

1766 West 46th Ave., Denver, Colo. —"I had a very sore leg. It troubled me for some twenty years and finally broke out to a running sore with much fever and terrible itching and burning. It burned and itched so badly I could not rest day or night and was obliged to lie in bed. The sores were in spots just as raw as a piece of beef. I used medicine, yet it wouldn't heal. Seeing the advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment I immediately wrote for some. The immediate cure was more remarkable than I can describe. I was completely cured." (Signed) Mrs. Curry Brown, April 11, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

Very Likely.

Congressman Henry decried mercenary marriage in Waco.

"Only the love match, he said, "insures beautiful and vigorous children. Hence I advocate the love match, and I sympathize heartily with a New York heiress to whom an elderly earl proposed.

"The earl, gray, poverty-stricken and decrepit, said to the beautiful young girl:

"'Dear lady, I love you more than words can tell.'

"She wrinkled up her pretty nose.

"'But I suppose you could tell me in figures,' she said, coldly."

Superiority.

"My wife can make a tart answer."

"My wife can do better than that. She can make a pie speak for itself."

WOMEN SHOULD BE PROTECTED

Against So Many Surgical Operations. How Mrs. Bethune and Mrs. Moore Escaped.

Sikeston, Mo.—"For seven years I suffered everything. I was in bed for four or five days at a time every month, and so weak I could hardly walk. I cramped and had backache and headache, and was so nervous and weak that I dreaded to see anyone or have any-one move in the room. The doctors gave me medicine to ease me at those times, and said that I ought to have an operation. I would not listen to that, and when a friend of my husband told him about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and what it had done for his wife, I was willing to take it. Now I look the picture of health and feel like it, too. I can do my own housework, hoe my garden, and milk a cow. I can entertain company and enjoy them. I can visit when I choose, and walk as far as any ordinary woman, any day in the month. I wish I could talk to every suffering woman and girl."—Mrs. DEMA BETHUNE, Sikeston, Mo.

Murrayville, Ill.—"I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for a very bad case of female trouble and it made me a well woman. My health was all broken down, the doctors said I must have an operation, and I was ready to go to the hospital, but dreaded it so that I began taking your Compound. I got along so well that I gave up the doctors and was saved from the operation."—Mrs. CHARLES MOORE, R. R. No. 3, Murrayville, Ill.

SCUTARI TAKEN BY MONTENEGRINS

TURKISH STRONGHOLD SUBJECTED TO CROSSFIRE FROM THREE POINTS.

TROOPS FORM JUNCTION.

King Nicholas' Troops Form Junction with Servian Forces—Ottoman Diplomats Still Condent of Final Success.

Paris, Oct. 29.—A special Rome dispatch says that advices were received there that Scutari had capitulated.

Rieka, Montenegro.—A general bombardment of Scutari has been going on. The town has been subjected to a cross-fire from the Montengrin batteries to the north, south and west and also from the island of Vranjina, on the lake, from which point of vantage King Nicholas watched the action.

After an hour a thick smoke was seen issuing from the eastern quarter of the town. The bombardment still continues.

The troops under General Vukotitch took the strongly fortified heights of Rosai, which dominate the approach to Ipek, also known as Petch, and continued their advance on the town.

On Oct. 25 the Montenegrin troops joined the Servian forces at Sienitza in Novipazar. King Nicholas telegraphed General Vukotitch, congratulating him on this event, which he said was unprecedented in five centuries.

Eski-Baba Captured.

London.—A brief Sofia dispatch announced what may prove to be the most important move of the victorious Bulgarian army so far—the capture of Eski-Baba. The dispatch describes this town as an important position on the main line between Adrianople and Constantinople, but omits to say whether the Bulgarians are in actual possession of the railway station.

If they are astride the railway at this point they have cut the communications between Constantinople and Saloniki. With 40,000 Turkish troops now in Adrianople, it had been supposed the Turkish forces, after the fall of Kirk-Kilisseh, were holding the line from Kuleliburgas to Lulehburgas, a short distance east of Eski-Baba.

Bulgars' Plan Comprehensive.

The Bulgarian plan of campaign, according to the well informed correspondent of the Vienna Reichspost at the headquarters of the Second Bulgarian army, will be the complete destruction of all the Turkish forces along the Maritzar river and those retreating across the Erkene river. He describes General Dimitrieff's army as advancing on a broad front, the right flank along a line from Yenidie to Eski-Baba, the western column to Havla, with the central column already in the vicinity of Kavakli. The eastern wing, in forced marches, is affecting a great turning movement by way of Bunarhissar, Visa and Serai towards the road from Lulehburgas to Chorlu.

Nazim Pasha, the Turkish minister of war and commander-inchief, is said to have reached Chorlu. A dispatch from Constantinople declares that the army is preparing to take the offensve and that the cabinet has decided to prosecute the war with the utmost energy and prepare for a winter campaign should the present operations result unfavorably for the Ottoman army.

Are Falling Back.

There is no indication where the Turks will make a stand. They are everywhere falling back before the victorious allies. They evacuated the town of Istip in Macedonia, without resistance, although it occupies a strong natural position.

FOUR AUTOISTS DROWN.

Party of Eight in Two Machines on Ferryboat.

Belvidere, N. J., Oct. 29—Four members of an automobile party, bound for Shawnee, Pa., from their homes in Noble, Pa., were drowned in the Delaware river while being ferried across from Delaware, N. J.

The dead: Mrs. Leon Gilbert, Miss Rebecca Tyson, Mrs. H. W. Trump, and Leon Gilbert, Jr., 7 years old.

There were eight members in the party in two automobiles. In one machine was Leon H. Gilbert, his wife, a daughter, Miriam Gilbert, and son, Leon Gilbert, Jr. In the other automobile were Mrs. H. W. Trump, Miss Tyson and Nathan Trump.

When the middle of the stream was reached the boat was struck and knocked from its course by a raft.

L. H. Gilbert and H. W. Trump were thrown into the water and swam to the Pennsylvania shore, while Miss Gilbert and Nathan Trump jumped onto the raft as it swung that way. The others clung to the machines and when the ferryman lost control of the windlass which propelled the boat, were thrown into the deep water.

Nineteen Blinded by Wire Flash.

Anderson, Ind., Oct. 29.—Nineteen persons are reported to have been stricken blind as a result of gazing at a light, caused by workmen welding by an electric process on a trolley wire, according to local physicians, who were called to treat the cases. Several who saw the light were not stricken until a few hours later. A local specialist stated that in each cases attended the inside of the eyelid was greatly irritated. He gave as his theory of the cause, the peculiar rays of light.

NERVOUS HEADACHE

And Numbness in the Hands and Arms.

This Iowa Woman Was in a Serious Condition and Her Cure Will Interest Many.

A cure of unusual interest and importance is related by Mrs. J. H. Morgan, of Correctionville, Iowa. After being a hopeless sufferer from sick headaches, she is now entirely free from attacks. She tells of her cure by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, as follows:

"Some years ago I was in a terribly nervous and run-down condition and suffered greatly from nervous headaches. I was treated for three months by a specialist in Chicago, who advised me to wear glasses, but he did not help me. My head seemed as though it would burst, and I had frequent dizzy spells. I was in despair of getting well until I read about Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and began taking them. A few boxes cured me and since then I have used them as a family medicine.

"Before the birth of my last child I suffered untold agony with pain and numbness in my hands and arms up to the shoulders. My hands were so swollen and the muscles so sore that I could hardly dress myself. For a time I could not close my left hand. During the day if I kept moving the pain did not seem to be so bad, but my hands were always numb. I again used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and found them good for this trouble also, as they entirely relieved me."

Unless properly treated sick headache is a disease of many years duration, as it occurs before the twentieth year in two-thirds of the cases and recurs with more or less regularity until the fiftieth year or later. It is usually hereditary and is probably directly caused by a defect in the process which changes the food we eat into blood. Most sufferers are troubled with obstinate constipation which makes it necessary to use a laxative.

An ideal combination treatment is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and the new laxative pills, Pinklets. This treatment is fully described in a little booklet, "The Treatment of Sick Headache," which is free on request, together with a sample of Pinklets, the little laxative pills.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale at all druggists, or will be mailed to any address, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y. Adv.

BECKER PLANS A MAY OUT

CHARGE CONVICTION AGAINST WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Also Declared Justice's Charge Was of Nature to Injure Chances.

New York, Oct. 28.—Police Lieutenant Charles Becker has spent his hours in the Tombs since the trial, planning his fight to annul the verdict of the jury which convicted him of the murder of the gambler, Herman Rosenthal.

Becker has lost none of the iron nerve which bore him through the trial and the ordeal of hearing himself condemned as guilty. He awoke refreshed from a sound sleep and after a hearty breakfast summoned his chief attorney, John F. McIntyre. The two conferred for more than an hour and later McIntyre announced that immediate notice of an appeal from the verdict would be filed. Without this appeal, Becker, who is due to be sentenced next Wednesday, would, if the usual procedure were followed, take his seat in the electric chair the first week in December. The filing of the notice, however, will act as a stay, and it is not impossible that many months will elapse before his fate is finally determined.

"I don't mind saying that we expect a reversal," Becker's attorney announced. "The appeal will be on the grounds that the verdict was against the weight of evidence; that the justice's charge was of a nature to injure the chances of the defendant; upon the justice's failure to rule that Sam Schepps was an accomplice in the murder and upon the error of law in the refusal of the justice to allow testimony submitted by the defense to go in the record."

Either "Whitey" Lewis or "Lefty Louie" will be the next man indicted for the murder, District Attorney Whitman has announced. The date fixed is Nov. 7.

MAN GORED TO DEATH.

Fatal Accident to Janitor of Lutheran College at Fergus Falls.

Fergus Falls, Minn., Oct. 28.—The Park Region Lutheran college here keeps a small herd of cattle to supply the students in the boarding school with milk and the cattle are in the pasture a short distance from the college buildings.

Among them is a fine Jersey bull which was presented to the college by the Red Wing seminary. Friday evening O. J. Langlie, the college janitor, went to the pasture to milk the cows and when he failed to return search was instituted and the body was found late in the night. He had been attacked by the bull which had gored him in a horrible manner.

Editor and Publisher.

Published every Friday at Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota.

Subscription Price: $1.00 per year, strictly in advance.

Entered as second-class matter Sept. 22, 1911, at the post office at Holt, Minnesota, under the act of March 3, 1879.

If you make any pretense of being a citizen, go and vote on Tuesday.

Taft says that the tariff is the real issue of the campaign. Judging from the general run of newspaper comment, we had begun to believe that the real issue of the Taft and Wilson campaings was to defeat Roosevelt,

Here's something worth remembering when you go to cast your vote on Tuesday next: Congressman Steenerson was the one Minnesota Progressive Republican who urged the democratic majority in Congress to repeal the Canadian Reciprocity bill. In a most forceful speech in support of this action he said: "We should not revise on the farmer until everybody else also has been revised. You should not let these people who are interested in Canadian reciprocity eat at the first table and let the farmer wait until the last table. You should serve them at the same table equally." This is only one of the thousands of good reasons why the farmers should vote for Steenerson.

That "Fish Trust" Story.

(Adv.; paid by Hans R. Selvog.)

To whom it may concern:—

As one of the fishermen on Lake of the Woods I want to say that the "fish trust" story being put out to hurt Marschalk's candidacy for representative has no foundation in fact, whatever. There are ten fisheries on the lake, using 87 nets, of which I own one using 9 nets, Harry Curry one with 8 nets, Paul Marschalk one with 11 nets, John Arnesen one with 4 nets, Wm. Zippel one with 8 nets, W. F Zippel one with 14 nets, Louis Neumiller one with 3 nets, Armstrong Trading Co. one with 18 nets, B. A. Arnesen one with 9 nets, Chas. Springsteel one with 3 nets. Each of these fishermen is the owner of his own outfit and got his license direct from the Game and Fish Commision. All of them being on an equal footing, in that respect. We sell our fish to whoever pays the best price, and have no knowledge of any "fish trust" other than what we have heard from politicians lately. The same law applies to Lake of the Woods as to all other boundary waters within the United States and also all the laws of the State of Minnesota, same as any other place in the state. The pond net law was passed in 1895. Fishing with hook and line is free to residents of Minnesota and non-residents have to pay a license fee of one dollar, which goes to the Game and Fish Commision.

I have known Mr. Marschalk personally for ten years and have always found him to be on the square, both in public and private affairs, and I hope you will not let anything as utterly ridiculous as that fish trust story keep you from voting for him.

Yours Very Truly,

HANS R. SELVOG.

Hans R. Selvog, being duly sworn, says that the statements made in the above letter are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

JOHN A. LARSON.

Frank O. Heulin's Announcement.

(Adv.; paid by Frank O. Heulin.)

To the voters of Marshall County:

Marshall County voters gave me such a big vote at the last election that I have consented to again seek the office of Representative from our District. Through some technicality my name cannot appear on the ballot in Roseau and Kittson counties, but provisions and many promises have been made to have my name written in, or stickers with my name on applied in voting for me in these counties, but nevertheless I must appeal to my home county people for double support on November 5th. If you believe in my platform in hav'ng a person of mature years and experience to represent you I ask your vote and support on election day.

Respectfully,

FRANK O. HEULIN.

For Judge of Probate

(Adv., paid by H. O. Berve.)

I am a non-partizan candidate for Judge of Probate for Marshall County. I am a resident of the eastern part of the county, where I am now engaged in farming, but have been a teacher in the schools of this county for nine years.

On account of the backward condition of farm work this year, I shall not be able to make any extensive personal campaign. For that reason I want to here state that, if elected, I shall discharge the duties of the office fairly and impartially, giving all possible assistance to those who may have any business to transact in the probate court. As a non-partizan candidate, I shall appreciate and be thankful for the support and vote of all political parties.

Yours truly,

Roosevelt is Second in Presidential Race and Taft in Third Place

It was a great Democratic Landslide, and Woodrow Wilson will be the next President of the United States.

According to the latest returns, received this morning, Governor Wilson has carried thirty seven states, Roosevelt seven and Taft three. California is still in doubt, but the last figures show Wilson having a lead of 99 votes.

Roosevelt carried Minnesota by about 12,000.

In the state election Gov. Eberhart has a majority of about 25,000 over Ringdahl, and the entire Republican ticket is elected by safe majorities. All of the congressmen were re-elected in this state.

In Marshall County the entire Republican ticket is elected, with the exception of Sheriff. For this office Sheriff Forsberg and John A. Sorum, of Holt, are running neck and neck, and, according to advises this afternoon, it will take the complete figures to tell which is the winner. The returns were not yet in from some of the eastern precincts.

A complete report of the earlier returns on the national and state tickets will be found on page 2.

WILSON ELECTED

SEEMS TO HAVE MADE ALMOST CLEAN SWEEPP—ALL SECTIONS GIVE HIM VOTES.

ANENORMOUS LANDSLIDE

Taft and Roosevelt Divided the Republican Vote and Neither Have Many States to Their Credit.

The election of 1912 will go down in history as a record breaker, and Woodrow Wilson will be elected president by the largest electoral vote ever received by any candidate in the history of the country. All previous majorities for any popular candidate will appear small besides the enormous vote received by the democratic candidate.

The earlier reports indicated a landslide to Wilson and the later ones confirmed them and added to the pluralities of the democratic nominee.

The republican vote the entire country over was about equally divided between President Taft and Colonel Roosevelt, and the list of states in which either of these candidates were successful was very small indeed.

The three-cornered presidential contest sent voters to the polls who took unprecedented interest in the outcome of the campaign which has been waged with unusual bitterness. Reports from every quarter of the United States indicate a record vote.

In addition to the national ticket thirty-three states voted for governor and thirty-six for a legislature to fill senate vacancies.

All the states were favored with Indian summer except Washington, Oregon and Minnesota, where a small amount of rain fell. The reports confirmed the belief of a record vote over the country.

The vacancy on the republican ballot caused by the death of vice-president Sherman was not filled and the name remained on the ballot.

BABY'S HAPPINESS DEPENDS ON HEALTH

When your baby is cross and fretful instead of the happy, laughing little dear you are accustomed to, in all probability the digestion has become disarranged and the bowels need attention. Give it a mild laxative, dispel the irritability, and bring back the happy content of babyhood.

The mother should make sure that the laxative used contains no opiate or narcotic drug. A mild, pleasant-tasting, harmless laxative like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is ideal for children because of its natural composition and gentle action. A small dose of Syrup Pepsin at bedtime will bring easy, certain relief next morning, and with no distressful griping or other discomfort. You can get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store. Your name and address on a postal to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 West St., Monticello, Ill., will bring a free trial bottle by return mail. Adv.

A Sick Man

Writes Dr. Hartman About Kidney Disease.

S. B. Hartman, M. D.

A gentleman writes me: "I was greatly interested in your article describing the Kauffman case of serious disease of the kidneys. The description of his case exactly outlines my condition. I am sure if Peruna cured him as you say, it would cure me also. I am losing flesh rapidly and the doctors say I have every symptom of Bright's disease of the kidneys. If you think I would be benefited by Peruna I will certainly try some as the doctors have practically given me up, the same as they did him."

In reply I wish to say, first, that I never make any promises as to what Peruna will cure. No physician can make positive statements of that sort. I can say this much, however, if I were in your place I should certainly give Peruna a trial. I know of no other remedy that would be so likely to be of use to you in your present condition as Peruna. Take a tablespoonful before each meal and at bedtime. Continue this for two or three weeks and then if there is anything you wish to ask me further write me and I will give your letter prompt attention.

If I find that the Peruna is not helping you I will be perfectly frank and tell you so, for I would not have you take Peruna unless it was really helping you. But it has rescued so many cases of kidney disease that I am quite confident you will find it exactly suited to your case.

Kidney disease begins with catarrh of the kidneys. Peruna is a catarrh remedy. Unless the destruction of the kidneys is already too great Peruna relieves the catarrh and the cause of the kidney disease is removed.

I shall anxiously await a report of your case. Remember, all letters are sacredly confidential. I never use any one's name or address without his written consent. My correspondence is absolutely private.

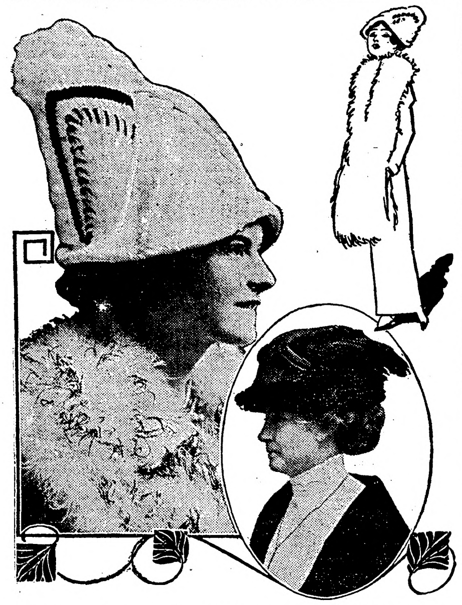
FOR COUGHS AND COLDS

FOR QUIET TASTE



Although elderly women allow themselves much greater latitude in the matter of shapes, when choosing millinery, than they did a few years ago, some of them look best in the close fitting comfortably made toques and continue to wear only this variety of headwear. But they like a change in methods of trimming and minor changes in shape, such as a variation in crown or brim outlines from season to season.

A very handsome toque is shown here, designed to meet just the demands made by elderly women of quiet taste. It is made of black silk having a high luster, and trimmed with wings and covered cords. It fits well down over the head and does not require a bandeau.

Hats of this character may be worn with a veil. The brim extends out at the front and prevents the veil from catching in eye-glasses. As veils are neat and becoming and, more especially as they hold straggling hair in place, a small hat should be shaped so that one may be worn with them.

There are numbers of soft, close-fitting shapes for those who are not wedded to the toque, and among these very novel designs in turbans. Many crowns are flexible and brims are not entirely rigid, being made over rice net foundations. Short curling plumes are used on many of them. Wings and breasts, however, have proven the most popular for trimming velvet turbans.

COLORS SHOULD BE STUDIED

Selection Is of Immense Importance, Especially to the Woman of Small Means.

The value of color is something that a clever dressmaker understands fully. Two dresses can be cut alike, line for line, but in different shades of the same silk, and one of them will make a woman look slender, straight and supple and the other will give her an unaccountably dumpy, round-shouldered, square-cut figure.

All women ought to make a careful study of colors, whether they have a professional interest in the matter or not.

It is especially important for women of small means, who have so few gowns that they must live with those of their choice very intimately. A woman who can buy twenty or thirty dresses a year can afford to make an occasional mistake when her fancy for a trying color or a too daring line carries her away for a moment. She can hang an unsuccessful dress in a closet and forget about it, and it does her no harm—helps her, perhaps, in choosing more wisely in the future. She does not suffer from her folly. But a woman of small means, who meets with a mishap in the choice of her one new gown, must wear it whether or no—a harsh commentary on her vanity, her poor judgment, or her bad taste.

The best plan is to choose carefully and buy slowly.

Borders Are Shown.

Infinite is the variety of bordered stuffs in black and in many colors. Crepon, which, by the way, is making its reappearance, is shown in black with velvet flowers, applique and a deep border of toweling embroidered all over with conventional flowers. This, of course, is destined for afternoon toilets, and an even more original design for the same purpose is composed of blue voile with a border of gray and blue tweed—of all things (and very smart it was!)—the voile having a rich flower design, very much raised as most of these patterns are.

In nearly every case when a Turkish border is used it finishes in a fantasy woven in the fabric rarely with a straight edge. Other materials show bars of contrasted color or embroidery graduated in width and running round a deep hem.

Short Trains Worn.

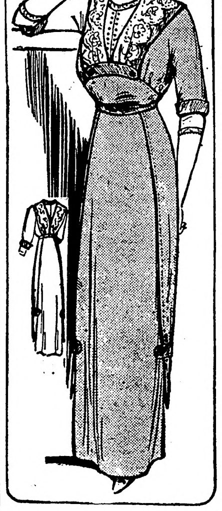
Many of the new evening gowns are made narrow, with short trains, the overmade showing bunches of rose leaves and forget-me-nots in their designs and come up high above the waistline, the back arranged with double box plaits, left unconfined and flowing, the high-waisted bodice having a girdle and a fichu of black mousseline edge with a white lace forming a V in front caught up to the girdle with a cameo. The tight sleeves have ruffles at the elbow.

HOME DRESS IN GREEN SHADE

Simple Model That May Be Made Most Attractive at a Very Reasonable Cost.

Reseda green cashmere is chosen for our simple model, which has the skirt trimmed in an original way by long pieces of material taken from the waist, and falling nearly to foot, where they are cut in points, a strap of material with a button sewn in each end keeps them in position.

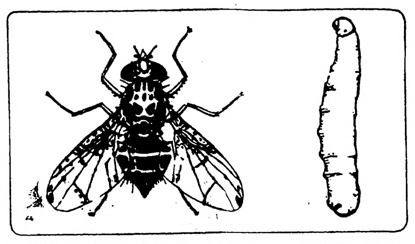
The Magyar bodice has a shaped piece above the waist in front, a strap heads this, and the sides are drawn up to fit it; pieces of material are taken from strap over shoulders to waist at back; embroidered silk covers these; plain forms the vest, which is trimmed with small buttons and finished at neck by a narrow insertion. The under sleeves are to match, while the over ones are finished with turn-back cuffs.



Materials required: 4½ yards cashmere 46 inches wide, 1½ yards embroidered silk, ½ yard plain silk 20 inches wide, ½ dozen large and 1½ dozen small buttons, 1 yard insertion.

MEDITERRANEAN FRUIT FLY IS SERIOUS DRAWBACK TO SUCCESSFUL CULTIVATION

Considerable Interest in Very Destructive Insect Recently Aroused by Action of Department of Agriculture in Calling for Hearings on Advisability of Quarantine.



The Mediterranean Fruit Fly and Larva. (Greatly Magnified.)

The recent announcement of Secretary Wilson of the department of agriculture of his purpose to hold hearings for the purpose of determining the advisability of a quarantine against importations of plants, fruits or trees from countries where the Mediterranean fruit fly is known to exist, has aroused considerable interest in this very destructive insect, and there have been many demands on the department for information concerning it. To meet this demand Dr. L. O. Howard, chief of the bureau of entomology, has had prepared a circular—No. 160 of his bureau—of which A. L. Quaintance is the author.

That the Mediterranean fruit fly is a most serious drawback to the successful cultivation of fruit in the countries where it is established, there can be no question. Indeed, the cultivation of fruits is scarcely possible in the worst infested regions. The fruit-growing industry of Bermuda was practically destroyed many years ago by the introduction of the insect into that island. Its introduction into the United States in all probability would be calamitous to the orchard interests of our more southern states and of California, in which regions it would find conditions very similar to those in countries where it now exists in most destructive numbers. By the establishment of a strict quarantine, such as proposed by the secretary, it is believed that it will be possible to prevent disaster to the American fruit industry.

The greatest amount of damage is done to the ripening fruit by the female, which, with her sharp ovipositor, pierces the fruit and deposits the small glistening white eggs just underneath the skin. These hatch in a very short time, two to four days in midsummer. Their development, however, depends upon the ripeness of fruit—in all probability if the fruit is green, the eggs will not hatch. The larvae or "maggots" when hatched at once begin to feed on the pulp of the fruit. In apricots they make straight for the center; in peaches and other fruits they are more inclined to work out in different directions. When fully developed, which usually requires a fortnight or three weeks, they leave the fruit, which has previously fallen, and enter the ground. Here they soon change to the pupal stage, and remain for 12 days to three weeks, when they become transformed into a fly, completing one generation.

The governments of certain countries have put in force regulations for the enforced control of fruit flies, and in each instance the principle followed has been the inspection of orchards and cleaning up and destruction of all fallen fruit. At the present time the United States authorities are experimenting with the "poison-bait" method of controlling the insect, similar to that tried in South Africa. In that case the bait consisted of a solution of five gallons of molasses, one pound of arsenate of lead, and 25 gallons of water. This was used in the form of a spray evenly distributed over the trees, bushes, prickly pears, etc. Not only were thousands of the flies prevented from reaching maturity, but the deposition of eggs in the fruit already ripening was almost completely stopped. The fruit on all the late varieties of treated trees ripened perfectly, and was sold on the market and guaranteed free from the maggots. On the trees that were not sprayed the situation was just the reverse, almost every ripe fruit being infested by maggots ranging from newly hatched to fully developed. The pupa were also present under some of the decaying peaches, and there were numerous flies flitting about the trees. The poisoned-bait method of controlling the fly appears entirely feasible in this country, especially in more or less arid regions, where the spray cannot be washed off by rains, and is not otherwise disturbed.

GRAPES NOT HURT BY HONEY BEES

Busy Little Workers Never Puncture Skin of Luscious Fruit, Says Expert.

There are some subjects on which it is impossible to convince our older farmers and fruit growers that their inherited notions are at fault. No amount of scientific assertion and demonstration by the highest authorities avail to change their opinions or to make them hesitate to assert and reassert them in their communications to agricultural journals and in meetings of societies where such questions are discussed.

One of these is that under certain climatic or other conditions wheat seed is transformed to chess seed; and another—much vouched for at this season—is that bees are injurious to grapes, says a writer in the Farm Progress.

Again and again have the most careful observers announced in lectures and published horticultural journals, that they had never seen a honey bee cut the skin of a ripe grape or of any other fruit.

Of course, it was freely admitted that bees were often seen sipping the juices of grapes that had been pecked by birds or clipped by the sharp jaws of wasps and other insects; and in this they do no harm, for a punctured or injured grape is of no further value to the vineyardist.

In an endeavor to settle this matter beyond dispute, Dr. Riley, while entomologist of the Department of Agriculture, authorized one of his assistants to investigate the matter thoroughly; and to do this a portion of a grape trellis with bearing vines enclosed in the most secure manner under a wire screened tent of considerable size, together with a hive of bees, with sufficient honey for their sustenance. As the grapes ripened the clusters were under almost constant inspection during the daylight hours, and, though the bees buzzed about them, never once during a period of several weeks was a bee seen to cut a grape, though when some were partly crushed by the attendant, the bees were eager for a sip of the fresh juice.

It would seem that nothing could be more conclusive for the exculpation of the bees from the charge of being depredators in vineyards, backed, as it is, by many other observations on the actions of bees in the open; and yet the same charge is made, year after year, by grape growers who experience loss in having their clusters mutilated, and who seem determined to consider the harmless bees as the principal source of the trouble.

FERTILIZER FOR GREENHOUSE USE

Many Weed Seeds and Disease Germs Contained in Ordinary Stable Manure.

The use of rotted stable manure as a source of greenhouse plant food has been the custom for so many years that more effective forms of plant food make headway slowly; yet this rotted stable manure has many disadvantages. It always contains more or les weed seeds as well as disease germs, and it supplies plant food in available form very irregularly.

Also by fermentation it materially influences the temperature of the seed beed, a temperature we have no means of regulating. The ammonia it contains is not nitrated, hence for forcing it cannot be safely relied upon. For greenhouse work the fertilizer chemicals should be used, such as nitrate of soda, acid phosphate, and sulphate of potash. They should always be used in such proportions that 100 pounds of ammoniate nitrogen are always accompanied by 30 pounds of phosphoric acid and 70 pounds of actual potash.

The quantity to be applied should correspond to about three-fourths of an ounce of ammoniate nitrogen per square yard of surface; that is, to each yard of bench, use about five ounces of nitrate of soda, three ounces of acid phosphate and two ounces of sulphate of potash A mixture of these proportions may be dissolved in water and applied in small proportions every few days, taking care, however, to cease applications with those plants it is desired to fully mature as soon as the desired growth is made.

Good Pasture Requirement.

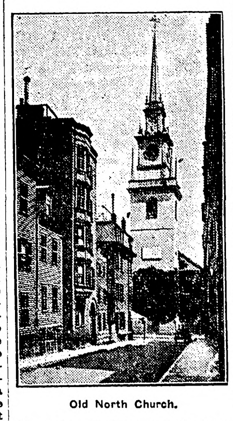
Time was when the hogs were supposed to have had excellent care when they had all the grain and slop they wanted in an 8x10 pen Nowadays a good pasture of clover, alfalfa or rape is considered an indispensable adjunct in the hog raising business by all farmers who are interested in economical pork production.

TO RESTORE FAMOUS CHURCH

Boston's Revolutionary Landmark Is Taking an Odd Appearance.

Boston.—From the chaos of loose bricks and unplastered panels, Christ church (better known as the Old North church of the school histories) is re-emerging in something closely resembling its original guise. Restoration it at best a difficult and often thankless task, but fortunately this process at Christ church was in part simplified by certain authentic records of the building's earlier history.

The first conspicuous change is in the building's exterior. During the last summer the walls have been sand-blasted, ridding them of the drab paint which has darkened them for years, and revealing the brick in a warm, rich tone, which will weather to a still more mellow red. The front doors of the church, which were without doubt not original, have been removed and a new pair, the lower panels of which have been given the diamond or triangular shape, has been substituted. Above them is a fan-light with leaded panes of glass. With the walls freshened to a glowing red and the spire and window frames trimmed with white paint, the church wears probably more nearly its original look than it has within the memory of any living person.



Old North Church.

The pew plan of the church was fortunately extant, and it was possible from the paneling which remained to reconstruct the pew arrangement in virtually the original form This has been carried out, using as much of the original paneling and as many of the old doors as remained, and making the new a faithful reproduction of the old. The pews as thus rebuilt are of the long, "slip" shape, and nearly uniform size, except those set apart for the notables—the governor's pew (which has, by the way, been made the graceful occasion of a generous gift from Governor Foss), and "the Pew for the Gentlemen of the Bay of Honduras," a group of merchants who gave, in the early days, the money for the spire.

During the turmoil of restoration the bust of Washington has been removed from the marble niche, but will be replaced, not for any special merit as a work of art which it may possess, but for long association and for its unique position as being the first public manument erected to Washington in America. Its date is 1815.

The walls, which were previously blank, save for frescoes, will be diversified by an array of appropriate tablets; one in memory of the first officers of the church, bearing the date April 1724; one in memory of Maj. John Pitcairn; one in memory of the Rev. Timothy Cutler; one in memory of the Rev. Mather Byles, the last minister before the revolution; one in memory of Capt Thomas James Gruchy, commander of the privateer Queen of Hungary, who gave the cherubim which ornament the front of the organ; and one to the memory of Capt. Cyprian Southack, who gave the belfry clock in use before the revolution.

GOLF BALL KILLED A BIRD

And It Kept on Its Way Toward Hole Without Even a Swerve at Country Club Links

Boston A strange freak of golf was witnessed on the Brae Burn Country club links a few days ago, when a ball driven from a tee killed a sparrow and then continued true in its flight. The incident was witnessed by a number of golfers.

The marksman was Joseph Gould. He was driving from the seventh tee. Mr. Gould got off a good drive and the ball soared high The bird was flying in the same direction and swerved just a trifle, apparently when it heard the buzz of the golf ball coming behind.

It is common knowledge that a golf ball is no mean projectile and in this case the bird was instantly killed and fell, a crumpled heap of feathers, as though it had received a charge of shot. The ball was hardly checked in its flight and landed on the green not far from the hole.

DREADED ATAXIA

What Active Treatment With Dr. Williams' Pink Pills Accomplished in a Recent Case.

Mr. Francis M. Poole, a harness maker, of Garvin, Lyon Co., Minn., says: "My illness started in 1902, with sharp pains all through my limbs. At first I thought it was rheumatism but the pains kept getting more and more severe and I grew steadily worse. Later a numbness came over my feet. It gradually extended up my legs to my spine and waist. By this time I had lost all control of my legs. Next my bladder and bowels were affected and I lost all control of them. At this stage of the disease I was perfectly helpless and from November, 1905, to April, 1906, I was confined to the bed. My memory was so affected that I thought I would lose my mind. I looked just like a dead person. My lips and finger nails were blue. I suffered with terrible sharp, shooting pains and could get relief only from the use of morphine.

"I was treated by five St. Paul doctors. All of them pronounced my case locomotor ataxia. One said I could not live a year and another told my wife all he could do for me was to give medicine to relieve the pain. I was discouraged and, when my brother-in-law urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, I did so willingly for he had read of their curing a case similar to mine. I started to take the pills in March, 1906, while I was still confined to bed. I took several boxes when I felt a slight change for the better and had a healthier look. I was finally able to go to the country but kept on with the treatment. The bluish color left my lips and my eyes became brighter. I took the pills a long time and the next spring in May I could walk around. In June I went to work although still weak. I kept on gaining and am now working without the return of a symptom of my former trouble and without losing a days' work. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People absolutely cured me and I want all fellow sufferers to know of my wonderful recovery."

Those who are interested in the treatment which cured this case should have our booklet, "Diseases of the Nervous System," which will be sent to every nervous sufferer upon request.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50 by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y. Adv.

THE BEST TREATMENT FOR ITCHING SCALPS, DANDRUFF AND FALLING HAIR

To allay itching and irritation of the scalp, prevent dry, thin and falling hair, remove crusts, scales and dandruff, and promote the growth and beauty of the hair, the following special treatment is most effective, agreeable and economical. On retiring, comb the hair out straight all around, then begin at the side and make a parting, gently rubbing Cuticura ointment into the parting with a bit of soft flannel held over the end of the finger. Anoint additional partings about half an inch apart until the whole scalp has been treated, the purpose being to get the Cuticura Ointment on the scalp skin rather than on the hair. It is well to place a light covering over the hair to protect the pillow from possible stain. The next morning, shampoo with Cuticura Soap and hot water. Shampoos alone may be used as often as agreeable, but once or twice a month is generally sufficient for this special treatment for women's hair.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

Fable for Borrowers.

An Arab went to his neighbor and said: "Lend me your rope."

"I can't," said the neighbor.

"Why can't you?"

"Because I want to use the rope myself."

"For what purpose?" the other persisted.

"I want to tie up five cubic feet of water with it."

"How on earth," sneered the would-be borrower, "can you tie up water with a rope?"

"My friend," said the neighbor, "Allah is great and he permits us to do strange things with a rope when we don't want to lend it."—Boston Evening Transcript.

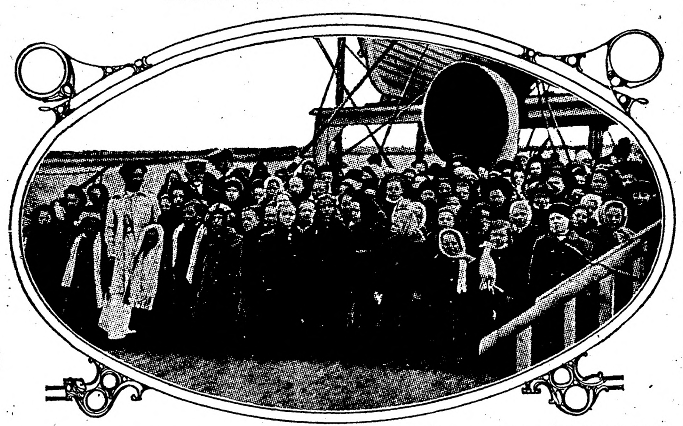
YOUNG IMMIGRANTS FOR CANADA



THE Barnardo homes in London have sent this year nearly a thousand boys and girls as emigrants to Canada, in addition to about 23,500 sent by them in former years. The illustration shows a large group of little girls who recently landed in the Dominion, there to find healthful and happy homes.

DEAF, BLIND, ALERT

Chicagoan's Unimpaired Faculties Developed to High Degree.

Harry L. Virden, Instructor of Walcott Combs, Is Working to Educate Others Like Himself—Tells How Youth Enjoys Play.

Chicago.—Wolcott Coombs, nineteen years old, was born without two of the most important faculties of man. he can neither hear nor see. In spite of this handicap in life, he has acquired an intellectual capacity under the personal instruction of his friend, Harry L. Virden, 2728 Washington boulevard, that is likely to make him another example, like Helen Keller, of what can be accomplished by persons whose perceptive faculties have been curtailed.

Coombs attends the theaters and enjoys the plays. He reads a great deal, favoring history and economics, and holds decided political opinions. He does expert hammock weaving. He uses the typewriter and produces clean, accurate "copy." He writes in all the forms used by deaf and blind people, as well as English script. He likes to converse with normal people, and has made many friends, who have been only too anxious to answer his questions.

Mr. Virden was inclined to be reluctant in admitting his part in Coombs' education. He questioned whether the same might not be done with any blind and deaf person who is anxious to learn.

"The fact that Coombs cannot hear or see has made him concentrate more on his other faculties," said Mr. Virden. "I do not believe that the remaining senses of a person so afflicted are more acute in proportion. They merely become more sensitive through use. Few of us normal persons use our eyes and ears properly."

Mr. Virden first became acquainted with Coombs while principal of the Oklahoma School for the Blind at Fort Gibson, Okla., which is near the lad's home. When he gave up his work there and came to Chicago, he brought the lad with him. He decided to give him every advantage in his power. Soon Coombs was able to converse quickly and intelligently with his teacher. Later he made many acquaintances in Chicago. Miss Mabel Taliaferro, who was then appearing in moving picture plays, proved a helpful friend. He also visited the juvenile court. He showed great interest in the welfare of juvenile offenders and held several conferences with Judge Pinckney.

"Although Coombs reads all manner of raised type and talks in the usual sign language, I found that the easiest way for him to communicate with strangers who did not know any sign language was to have the letters of the alphabet traced on the palm of his hand. Any one can speak with him in this fashion, and, of course, I can communicate more rapidly because I use abbreviations which we both understand.

"At the theater I hold his hand and convey to him the words of the players. The pauses give me plenty of time to keep up with the dialogue."

Mr. Virden is a member of the committee on special education of the National Educational association and as such will visit every institution for the deaf, dumb and blind in the United States. He believes that many of his investigations will have a direct bearing on the future of education for the deaf and blind.

Many of our state institutions are highly efficient," said Mr. Virden. The field of education for persons both deaf and blind, however, has hardly been touched. A great deal can be done for them when once we know what means to employ to help them."

BABIES IN RACE FOR RECORD

Little Girls in Minnesota Are Backed by Fond Parents—Both Are Remarkable.

Minneapolis.—Mary Louise Chamberlain, daughter of George H. Chamberlain of Marshall, Minn., is a rival of Margaret Terry Hudson Grant, daughter of the director of track athletics at the University of Minnesota, as "the state's most perfect baby."

Miss Grant, ever since she was a few weeks old, has been in training by means of physical exercises to become the world's most perfect woman, but Miss Chamberlain, according to her father, has not enjoyed scientific physical training, only a heritage of perfect health and physique. These things, he declares, coupled with careful rearing, have made her what she is.

Here are some of the figures of comparison of the two rivals:

Mary Louise: Thirty-two pounds; two years two months; biceps, 7 inches; chest, 21 inches; no fat.

Margaret: Twenty-eight pounds; two years; biceps, 5 inches; chest, 19 inches; no fat.

SACRED CAT STOLEN

Young Sailor Man Strays Into a Temple in Bombay.

Escapes Through Crowds of Pursuing Hindus With the Feline Guard Clawing at His Spinal Column.

New York.—A daring apprentice who had the audacity to steal into a Hindu temple and kidnap a sacred cat is the hero of a tale that the British tramp steamer Harpagus brings to the port of New York.

The Harpagus' apprentice, Albert Berrige, passed behind the veil of one of the most sacred temples of the Hindus in Bombay and saw with his Caucasian eyes the great idols and returned to the outer world with the sacred cat.

The cat once bore, no doubt, a strange Indian name, but since joining the British tramp the sacred feline has been dubbed Tommy. Tommy is as black as the conscience of a bigamist and is not very different from the cats of New York. Black cats bring good luck to ships that plow the seven seas, so Tommy is held in great esteem aboard the Harpagus, almost as great esteem as when he was a sacred cat in a mystic Hindu temple.

While the Harpagus swung at her anchor off the City of the Dreadful Night, as Kipling called Bombay, towering domes of the Hindu temples kindled Albert's imagination and he chafed at the bit until he had obtained shore leave.

"Be back by sundown, young man," ordered the captain as the apprentice went over the side midday.

There was so much to interest Albert that he forgot altogether the captain's injunction to be back to the Harpagus by sundown. Darkness had enveloped the city when Albert reached one of the Hindu temples, probably the most sacred in all Bombay. There was a special celebration going on at the temple and crowds of the faithful reverently were wending their way up the broad steps and through the doorway.

Albert had not been told that all but Hindus are barred from the temples, and with true apprentice audacity he joined in the throng and, undiscovered in the crowd and in the darkness, he passed through the entrance and found himself within the sacred place.

"Suddenly I felt something hit me in the middle of the back. Then I felt sharp claws digging into my hide. The next instant I was traveling like a meteor toward the temple entrance and every man jack of those Hindus in pursuit. The howls of the Hindus and the claws of the cat inspired me to the effort of my life. I think I could have broken all the running records in the world with that encouragement," said Albert in telling of his experience.

"The Hindus soon were distanced. I muts have run for a mile with that cat clawing at my spinal column. Then when I got up a dark street I stopped and tried to dislodge the cat. I finally had to take off my coat to get the beast to release his claws.

"After I had Mr. Catty in my arms he was as docile as you please and purred in real cat fashion. So I says to myself, it's a black cat and that means good luck. So I'll take him to the Harpagus. I had some fun explaining why I was so late, but I had the cat to prove my adventure in the temple and the old man let it go at that."

CHURCH MUST BE ADVERTISED

"Get Publicity or Fall Behind." Philadelphia Minister Declares in Snappy Sermon.

Philadelphia, Pa.—In a snappy sermon delivered in Central Congregational church, Eighteenth and Green streets, the pastor, Rev. Sydney Herbert Cox, declared that the church must advertise, and get publicity, learning from business men how to go forward.

He took the stand that a business house which does not advertise goes in bankruptcy, and so will the church fall behind if it neglects this important matter.

It was the first of a series of sermons on the "Twentieth Century Progressive Church," and the title of the sermon was the "The Business Advertising Church."

"The greatest advertiser in the world," said Mr. Cox, "is God. There is nothing more spectacular than his message to Jacob by the angels. Balaam by the ass, Elijah by the storms and voice, and Elisha and the fiery chariot. I got my sermon from a broker, who laid down the four cardinal principles of advertising—namely, secure attention, create curiosity, inspire confidence, get the man.

"An angel appeared in flames, and thus secured attention; Moses looked on the burning bush, and became curious. Moses placed his hands in his bosom, and it became leprous. He was told to repeat it, and with confidence did so, and his hand was well again. Moses and Aaron went forth and 'got the man.'"

"DEAD ONES" MAY BANQUET

Imitation Skulls Will Be Used as Drinking Cups by Minnesota's Defeated Candidates.

Minneapolis. — Imitation skulls with silver mountings are to be the drinking cups of the banquet of political "dead ones," which is being planned by John P. Nash for defeated candidates for public office. While the date has not been set, the banquet probably will take place after the general election.

Efforts now are being made to obtain the use of the county morgue for the banquet hall.

Each banqueter will be limited to ten minutes to tell how it happened.

SCHOOL IS BAD FOR BOYS

Physical Defects Seem to Develop Rapidly in Upper Grades, Board Finds.

Orange, N. J.—Statistics compiled by the high school faculty covering a period of several years seem to show that the average schoolboy deteriorates physically ah he progresses in the classroom.

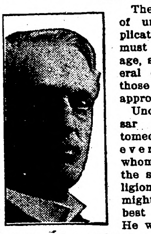
In the first year of high school, for example, the percentage of round shoulders is 45 and the fourth 51. Uneven shoulders are found among 14 per cent. of the first year and 32 of the fourth. Weak feet appear in 11 per cent of the first-year boys and 30 of the fourth.

Similar results are found in the statistics covering flat chest, pigeon breast, curvature of the spine, hollow back, knock-knee and flatfoot

To Whom Should We Speak?

By REV. HOWARD W. POPE,
Superintendent of Men of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago

TEXT—Jeremiah 1:6-7: Then said I, Ah, Lord God! behold, I cannot speak: for I am a child. But the Lord said unto me, Say not, I am a child: for thou shall go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak.



There is no rule of universal application, but one must consider the age, sex, and general condition of those whom he approaches.

Uncle John Vassar was accustomed to speak to every person whom he met on the subject of religion, but his rule might not be the best one for all. He was a man of years and experience, and he could hold his own with people whom a younger person could not so successfully deal with. On one occasion he accosted two ladies in a hotel in Boston and inquired if they were Christians. "Certainly," they replied.

"Have you been born again?" he asked.

"This is Boston," said the ladies, "and you know that we do not believe in that doctrine here."

Uncle John opened his Bible and showed them what God has to say about the subject, and in a short time all three were on their knees. When her husband returned at night, one of the ladies told him about her encounter with Uncle John.

"I wish I had been here," said the man.

"What would you have done?" asked his wife.

"I would have told him to go about his business."

"But, husband, if you had been here, I think you would have said that he was about his business."

That was a true estimate of Uncle John Vassar. He made it "his business" to witness for Christ always and everywhere. Let us make it our business to witness for the master at all times, and in all places. It may not seem best to speak to every one whom we meet, but we should at least be willing to do so, if God requires it. Whether he does or not, can usually be determined by asking him.

Mr. Moody's Rule.

When Mr. Moody was just beginning to do Christian work, he promised God that he would speak to one person at least on the subject of religion, every day for a year. He kept his promise faithfully until the last day of the year. That night as he was about to retire, he remembered that he had not spoken to any one that day on the all-important question. It was rather late, but he did not wish to break his record, and so he rushed out into the street, and hailing the first person whom he met, he inquired if he was a Christian. The man told him it was none of his business, and added some other remarks not altogether complimentary.

Mr. Moody returned to his room thinking that he had made a fool of himself, and that probably he had hurt the cause which he meant to help. One of his friends who had heard of the incident rebuked him sharply, and told him that he must stop speaking to people in such an abrupt way, or he would make himself obnoxious.

God evidently took a different view of the matter, for in a few days the man whom he addressed so abruptly sought him out, apologized for the way in which he had abused him, told him that he had had no peace since that night on account of his sins, and asked him to show him the way of salvation. If we listen to the devil he will tell us that any kind of Christian work is foolish. Let us listen to God alone.

Begin at Home.

It is so much easier to speak to others than to those of our own household, that they are liable to be overlooked, but we certainly have a duty at home which we cannot afford to neglect. If our life has been inconsistent, we had better confess it frankly before we talk to others about their life. If we wait until we are perfect before we begin, we shall never begin. Remember that all God's work is done by imperfect workmen.

Do not omit to speak to the children of Christian parents, ministers included. Too often they have been so busy looking after other people's boys and girls that their own have been neglected. We are often mistaken in assuming that those who live in Christian homes must necessarily be Christians.

Surely all of our schoolmates, shopmates and friends have a right to expect of us a real interest in their spiritual welfare. It is not wise to talk to them constantly on the subject of religion, but we should let them know how we feel, and that they are on our heart all the time, even if we only speak to them occasionally.

It is here perhaps that the greatest perplexity arises, but let us never forget that we have an infallible guide who is sufficent for all emergencies

INDUSTRY AND MECHANICS

HANDY IN SHARPENING TOOLS

Grooves and Bevels Arranged for Effective Work on Scissors and Other Like Implements.

For the sharpening of scissors, knives or any kind of tools a New York man has designed the implement seen in the illustration. This consists of a body of some sharpening material, with grooves around it and a V-shaped slot in one end. The other end terminates in a beveled portion with a beveled head. Between the head and the body is a deep groove, which makes it particularly effective in the sharpening of scissors, as both blades of the scissors can be ground at the same time. This tool can be used by hand or can be rigged up with a treadle such as peripatetic scissors grinders use and revolved rapidly by foot power. Naturally, this is a much more effective method. The flat top of the head and other portions of the implement can also be used for sharpening.

INCREASE STRENGTH OF BOAT

Vessel Recently Constructed in England on Which Is What Is Called Corrugated System.

As a means of increasing the longitudinal strength of a vessel without any corresponding increase in the weight, a vessel has been recently constructed in England on which is called the corrugated system, and the results of the innovation as noted in actual experience have been very satisfactory. Along the entire length of the vessel there are two corrugations in the lower part of the hull and are entirely out of sight when the vessel is loaded and their efficacy in imparting increased stiffness to the hull are not to be questioned. The stress on the material is reduced at both keel and gunwale. The construction of the sides of the ship with these corrugations is rather an addition than a vital alteration of the main structural system, and it can be supplied to any type of steamship. The builders claim that the extra cost is slight; and the dead weight carrying capacity is increased from three to four per cent. The coal bill is reduced from 12 to 15 per cent for the same speed; or, if the coal consumption is maintained as before, the speed of the ship with the extra dead weight is increased from 0.25 to 0.5 knot, according to the size and class of the ship.

HEATS INTERIOR OF BARREL

Manhattan Inventor Has Arranged Structure for Use Inside of Keg—Also Melts Resin.

The Scientific American in describing an invention of R. Dronia of Manhattan, N. Y., says:

The object of this invention is to provide a structure in which a flame may be used interiorly of the keg for heating the same. A further object is to provide a housing designed to be maintained substantially full of water, from which projects a heating device arranged to extend through the bunghole of a keg or barrel so that when the resin or pitch in the keg or barrel has been melted the same will pass out the bunghole into the receptacle or reservoir and will be chilled by the water so as to quickly coagulate or solidify. A perspective view is herewith given of the invention showing a keg in position.

SKYSCRAPER STYLES OF 1912

Prospect Bright That Lofty Structures Will Harmonize With Each Other, Says Architect.

"Impressive as the cliffs of Toledo," is the phrase used by a prominent architect in describing how Michigan avenue, in Chicago, would appear if its skyscrapers were designed as large scale compositions of line and mass, without recourse to the conventional styles, each building harmonizing with its neighbor. An article in the Popular Mechanics states that a new school of architects, believers in this style of design, is now coming to the front in smaller buildings, and it is only a question of time when these architects will invade the skyscraper field. In the meantime architectural details and ornaments are classic, Romanesque, gothic or renaissance, according to the preference of the architect or owner—and a city street is a jumble of all these styles. But, broadly speaking, certain principles are coming to be recognized and the buildings being erected this year show a decided advance in the adoption of those principles by architects generally.

When the construction of skyscrapers first began architects were at a loss to devise a style of treatment suited to what was called "a building set on end." Bruce Price, a New York architect, conceived the idea of designing such a building in a way analogous to a column—that is as shaft and capital. This treatment is now generally followed. The base is usually three stories in height, with strong horizontal lines, and serves to break the vertical effect of the middle or shaft section. The capital or architectural attic serves the same purpose at the top of the building. In the middle section the vertical lines are accentuated. In this way the building forms a complete composition, having a beginning, a middle and an end.

TO OPEN WRAPPERS EASILY

Paper Cover With Two Rows of Perforations Makes Simple Method and Saves Magazines.

There is scarcely one of us who has not torn a magazine in removing the wrapper—if the publication comes rolled. And those of us who have not torn the magazine have worked long and patiently to get the wrapper off without damage. Often an end of the wrapped is inserted between the leaves of the periodical it contains and that makes it still harder to remove without tearing the latter. But here is a simple method of making a wrapper that can be taken off in a second and without any damage. Near the gummed end of the wrapper, which is the outside end, two rows of perforations, about half an inch apart, are run across the paper. This does not weaken the wrapper and all that need be done to open it is to pull out the strip, when it falls apart. Any one can make such a wrapper with the aid of a pattern cutter equipped with a perforating wheel.

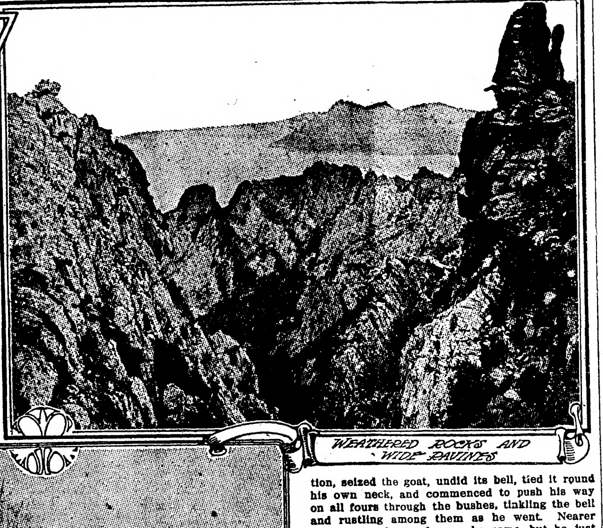
A GLIMPSE of CORSICA

BY A. J. BLACKIE

WHERE SILENT NATURE REIGNS

A BROCCIA FACTORY



ON a perfect sunny morning in February we stood on the hillside overlooking the town of Ajaccio and rejoiced that we had come to Corsica. The magnificent gulf lay before us with a grand range of mountains on the opposite shore, and, best of them all, Monte d'Oro rose up eight thousand feet into the sky, his peak decked with just a sprinkling of snow, as if he alone could wear that glittering crown while all lesser heads remained uncovered. In early spring the neighborhood of Ajaccio is very beautiful. There is a fascinating daintiness about the almond blossom, and you may look from its delicate pink over the soft, gray olives and the shining blue water to the purple haze of the mountains beyond. Many lovely walks are to be had all around, but to see the full beauties of the island one must go further afield.

ALMOND BLOSSOM IN SPRING

Soon after our arrival we engaged a tiny carriage and started to explore the wonders of Piana and Evisa. There is much that is worthy of note on the forty-five miles of road leading to Piana, but on arriving at the top of the hill overlooking the village, all that has gone before is eclipsed. Suddenly the Gulf of Porto, with Piana in the foreground, comes into view. We greeted this first glimpse of Porto with a gasp of surprise and delight.

Seen through the translucent yet slightly hazy atmosphere of a perfect day it is a marvelously beautiful scene. Away down beneath us the blue sea lay calm and tranquil in the evening light, while the beautiful headlands of Cappo Senino and La Scandola stretched out beyond. The perfect outline and shapes of these noble headlands, all of a glowing red, and the deep purple shadows that melt into the deeper blue of the sea below, make a scene of supreme beauty never to be forgotten, and far beyond the powers of the camera to depict.

On reaching the hotel we had a hurried meal and started for our first visit to the Calanches with what remained to us of the evening light. No description can give an adequate idea of the absolute magnificence of the gorges and gulfs and towering piles of red-colored rocks. They must be seen to be appreciated. Down, down, away so deep, a small torrent was carving its way still deeper through the granite rock below, and up and up, tier upon tier rose above, with glades of splendid pines and bushes making valleys in the recesses. Rocks of all forms, weathered into ragged, fantastic shapes, often honeycombed into caverns and caves innumerable, greet you on every side. Weird shapes appear round corners like gnomes who seem to resent intrusion. Every bend in the winding road presents a fresh scene of wonder, and we passed from deep gorges to masses of towering rocks, and on again to wider ravines opening out to sea with the distant headlands beyond.

After this first sight of the Calanches we spent weeks exploring and scrambling about among its wonders, yet there was always something new to see. One of our rambles was to a promontory called Cappo Rosso, where we came on a goatherd's hut, which proved to be a headquarters for making the "Broccia" or "Brouch," as it is called. A dead tree stood near the door hung with an assortment of black pots, while near by lay a heap of wooden tubs. We were pleased to note that all the pots and tubs were kept really very clean, and were hung out in the open air. Seeing this, and knowing that the goats' milk had to undergo much boiling before the "Broccia" was made, all fears as to the hygiene of the cookery departed. Good the "Broccia" is when well made, and we had many opportunities of enjoying it. Piana has a name for making some of the best "Broccia" in Corsica, so we know what it ought to be like. It is snow white, with the consistency of cream cheese, and it is eaten with sugar and occasionally with the addition of a few drops of eau de vie.

After our stay at Piana we drove on to Evisa, through such a wealth of magnificent scenery that it is impossible to describe it here. The road itself is a triumph of engineering skill. It descends from Piana to the sea-level at Porto, then mounts to a height of three thousand feet, performing marvels in the way of lacets as it climbs round the mountain-sides, yet the gradient is quite gentle all the way and the surface remarkably good. At nearly every point where the lacets cut away into the mountain there is a gorge or ravine, some large, some small, but all beautiful. Many of these are so wild and rugged that the thought at once struck us what perfect hiding places they would be for bandits, and how impossible it would be for any gendarmes to approach unseen.

The so-called "bandit" in Corsica is not a brigand lurking behind the rocks ready to issue forth and plunder the passer-by. He is, in fact, an outlaw, a man who has, perhaps, killed another in vendetta as a private act of vengeance according to a Corsican's idea of justice, but who has thereby broken the French law and is compelled to take to the "maquis" to hide from the gendarmes, as well as from the relations of the man he has killed. In a country so rough as this the gendarmes have a very poor chance, and many exciting tales are told of their encounters with the bandits. On one occasion when old Bellacoscia, the renowned bandit, was hard pressed, the gendarmes managed to get him into a ravine from which there was no outlet but the entrance, and there he was, trapped, with the gendarmes guarding the approach. It was late evening, and they felt so confident of getting their quarry that they thought it safe to wait till morning to close in upon him and make an easy capture. So they set themselves to watch the entrance through the night and make their capture at dawn. Things must have looked black for Bellacoscia that night as he waited in the dark, the stillness only broken by the tinkling bells of the goats that were feeding among the "maquis." But he was a man of resource, and as he waited there an idea occurred to him. An old goat browsing near kept tinkling its bell as it fed, and Bellacoscia, in a moment of inspiration, seized the goat, undid its bell, tied it round his own neck, and commenced to push his way on all fours through the bushes, tinkling the bell and rustling among them as he went. Nearer and nearer the gendarmes he came, but he just went boldly on in the dark, "acting the goat" to such good purpose that the unsuspecting sentinels merely thought that an old goat was eating its way along among the bushes in the erratic way goats have. So Bellacoscia passed right through the guarding gendarmes and clean away. When morning dawned the certain capture was not effected, and Bellacoscia was free to give more trouble in the future. Another time he was flying from capture, the gendarmes close on his heels, when he found the way blocked by a river in flood, and escape seemed impossible. Every minute his pursuers were gaining. He could not cross, and to go back meant certain capture. Again his wits saved him. He scrambled down to the marshy banks of the river where there were some dark, reedy pools, cut a hollow reed, put one end in his mouth, and sank himself down into the slimy black water till he was completely covered, with only the broken end of the reed projecting into the air, and through this he breathed in comfort. The gendarmes came rushing down to the river, where a moment before they had seen the fugitive, but now, when they reached the place, Bellacoscia was gone—clean vanished, as if he had been spirited away, and they went back to report that "the devil had certainly got him for he had undoubtedly been there, he had never gone away, and he certainly was not there now!"

Towards evening we reached Evisa, a happy little village rejoicing in a grand position, and well worth a visit. If it were only to see the view looking down the gorge to the Gulf of Porto, that alone would be worth the journey. Just before the forest of Aitone commences one should leave the road and scramble across a field to a projecting mass of rocks, for there can be seen a sight that must equal many of the finest prospects in the world for majestic beauty. An immense gorge enclosed by magnificently shaped mountains extends below, crowned at the end by that king of them all, Cappo d'Orto, and away beyond lies the blue sea, all hazy and soft in the distance. While standing on the rocky projection overlooking this impressive scene, a sense of littleness comes over the beholder, and one feels almost like an intruder in this solitary spot,

Where silent Nature reigns alone
Majestic, on her craggy throne.

WHY THE GERMANS LEAD.

Influence Exerted by the "Continuation School" in the Fatherland.

An American manufacturer who had wondered at the success of his German competitors was struck by certain big, flaming, official-looking posters on the billboards and around public buildings in Berlin. He might have seen similar posters in every city and town in Germany. Twice a year these official posters summon the youth of the land to obligatory attendance at the trade and commercial schools, Hubert Evans writes in Harper's Weekly. Indirectly, they tell why the American or the English manufacturer finds in the German such a dangerous competitor. They reveal the secret of Germany's wonderful commercial and industrial prosperity and of her commanding position as a world power. To the philosophically inclined they suggest interesting reflections on the transformation of idealists and dreamers into a nation of materialists and doers.

There is scarcely anything in all Germany so new and modern as the continuation schools. This whole movement has been a matter of only a few years, and in its present form the continuation school is a child of yesterday. These institutions receive from the nation more care and solicitude than is bestowed upon the children of the imperial family. They are still in a rapid process of change and development. Their very success has encouraged further changes and more stringent legislation in their behalf. It is only a few years ago that an imperial industrial law was passed giving community authority to establish and maintain obligatory continuation schools for youths, thus making good the failure of certain German state governments to provide for such school by state law. One of the last acts of the reichstag last December was to amend this law so as to make it apply to all girls employed in offices, stores and factories, as well as to boys. The whole subject is still so new and fresh that every day the German press has some interesting item of continuation school news—the opening of more domestic science schools for girls, the establishment of training colleges for continuation school teachers, the publication of new laws and material decrees.

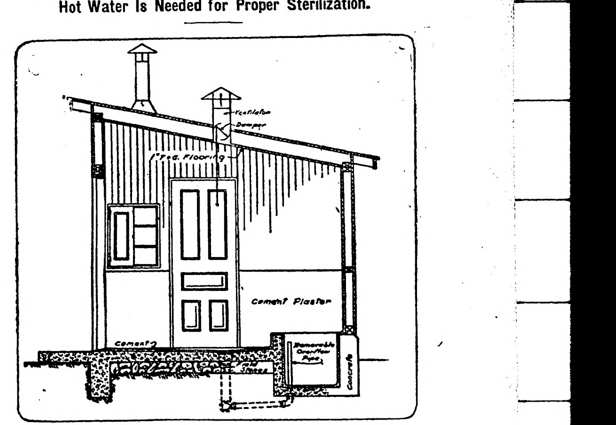
PLAN FOR PRACTICAL AND INEXPENSIVE SANITARY STRUCTURE FOR DAIRY FARM

Building Should Be Conveniently Located and Must Be Entirely Free From Contaminating Surroundings—Abundance of Hot Water Is Needed for Proper Sterilization.



Cross Section of Dairy House.

Recent developments in dairying have caused a large demand for a dairy house which will fulfill sanitary requirements and at the same time be practical and inexpensive. For those who are striving to improve the quality of their products, such a building is an absolute necessity. Milk which is poured or strained in the barn, or allowed to stand there, is apt to be contaminated by germs and to absorb stable odors. The best practice is to remove the milk to the dairy house as soon as each cow is milked. Milk should also be cooled immediately; so the dairy house should be provided with proper facilities for this purpose.

While the dairy house should be conveniently located so that the milkers do not have a long walk from the barn, it must be so placed that it is free from contaminating surroundings. It should be built somewhat away from the barn on a well-drained spot, and the drainage of the dairy house itself should be carried well away from the building. If possible, the ground should slope from the dairy house toward the barn, rather than from the barn toward the dairy house.

The principal purpose in building a dairy house is to provide a place where dairy products may be handled apart from everything else. To carry out this idea it is necessary to divide the interior of the building so that utensils will not have to be washed in the same room where the milk is handled. Thorough cleanliness must always be keept in mind; therefore there should be no unnecessary ledges or rough surfaces inside the building, so that it can be quickly and thoroughly cleaned. Ventilators are necessary to keep the air in the milk room fresh and free from musty and other undesirable odors, and to carry off steam from the wash room. Windows are of prime importance, as they let in fresh air and sunlight, and facilitate work. In summer the doors and windows should be screened to keep out flies and other insects.

It is imperative that there should be a plentiful supply of cold running water at the dairy house. If it is not possible to have a regular water system, the supply may be piped from an elevated tank fed by a hydraulic ram, engine, windmill or hand pump. The dairyman can ill afford to spend his time in carrying water in a pail to cool his milk and wash his utensils.

For the proper sterilization of utensils an abundance of steam or hot water is needed. A pail or can may be clean to the eye and yet may carry numberless germs which will hasten the souring of milk, cause bad flavor in butter or cheese, or spread contagion. After utensils are washed clean they should be either scalded with boiling water or steamed.

The dairy house should be so built that labor is economized to the greatest extent. To do this the building must be arranged so that unnecessary steps will be avoided.

It is not possible to submit a plan which will suit all conditions, but it is believed that the accompanying design will meet the needs of the average dairy that ships either milk or cream in cans. This plan is capable of considerable variation to adapt it to a wide sphere of usefulness. For larger dairies the same arrangement may be used on a larger scale, each room being made of greater size.

The building illustrated herewith is 20 feet long, 10 feet wide, 8 feet, 6 inches high in front and 6 feet, 6 inches high in the rear, and is covered with a shed roof. The exterior of the building may be covered with sheathing and building paper or weather boarding and shingles; expense, durability and appearance being the deciding factors. The interior, however, should be carefully finished, so that the walls and ceiling may be smooth and free from corners or projections which might accumulate dust and dirt.

The building should have a good concrete floor, pitched to drain through bell traps. The side walls should be plastered with cement plaster on metal lathing as high as the windows. The remainder of the walls and ceiling may be covered with matched flooring, and both walls and ceiling should be painted with a white, washable enamel paint. Ventilating flues should extend through the roof from the ceilings of the cooling room and the wash room. The windows should be hinged, as shown in the drawings, and set to be flush with the inside wall when closed.

The equipment consists of a 1½ to 2 horsepower vertical boiler, which supplies steam to the sink and to the steam jet in the drain board; a galvanized iron wash sink, a can rack, a Babcock tester, a concrete cooling tank, a milk cooler and milk scales.

After the cow is milked the pail of milk should be carried to the milk room, weighed, recorded, and sampled for the composite test. Then the milk is run over the cooler, using cold running water for the first cooling. When a can is filled with milk from the cooler it is put in the cement tank, which should be filled with ice and water high enough to come well up on the neck of the can, and the contents should be stirred frequently with a clean stirrer and thoroughly cooled. When the milk is not being stirred the cans should always be kept covered to prevent the entrance of dust, dirt, insects, etc. Never mix warm and cold milk or cream. The doors of the milk room should be kept shut except when necessary to pass in or out.

When all the milk is cooled, the cooler, pails, strainers, etc., can be carried into the wash room, where they should be rinsed in cold water and then washed with hot water and washing powder. After this they are inverted on the drain board and rinsed and steamed. For this purpose two pipes may be used, one carrying cold water, the other steam. These may be controlled by either hand or foot levers. Or a single jet may be installed, fed by both cold water and steam. Utensils after being steamed should be inverted on the drying rack.

The little closet in the wall between the milk room and the wash room is to hold bottles in which composite milk samples from each cow may be kept.

NEITHER HAYSEED NOR ANGEL

But There Need Be Little Question That Young Lady Had Much Ingenuity.

Across the line on the Kansas side where the study of agriculture is compulsory, one of the high school girls took home her monthly report card and proudly announced:

"I took the highest grade in the class in history, English literature and German."

"That's all very well," replied her father, critically examining the card, "but how about this grade in agriculture?"

"Oh, well," explained the daughter, "I'm no hayseed!"

A little farther down a deportment grade, not altogether satisfactory, appeared.

"And how do you account for this grade in deportment?" he inquired.

"I'm no bloomin' angel, either," she replied.—Kansas City Star.

During the progress of the morning both of a few months old infant or little neighbor girl came into the room carrying a doll and stood watching the operation for some time. The little girl's doll was much the worse for hard usage, being minus an arm and a leg. Finally she said to the mother of the child:

"How long have you had your baby?"

The child was informed, and, looking from her doll to the baby, she said:

"My, but you have kept it nice."—National Monthly.

"PROUD AND GLAD"

Because Mother Looked So Well After Quitting Coffee.

An Ohio woman was almost distracted with coffee dyspepsia and heart trouble.

Like thousands of others, the drug —caffeine—in coffee was slowly but steadily undermining her nervous system and interfering with natural digestion of food. (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the poisonous drug found in coffee.)

"For 30 years," she writes, "I have used coffee. Have always been sickly—had heart trouble and dyspepsia with ulcers in stomach and mouth so bad, sometimes, I was almost distracted and could hardly eat a thing for a week.

"I could not sleep for nervousness, and when I would lie down at night I'd belch up coffee and my heart would trouble me. It was like poison to me. I was thin—only weighed 125 lbs., when I quit coffee and began to use Postum.

"From the first day that belching and burning in my stomach stopped. I could sleep as soundly as anyone and, after the first month, whenever I met any friends they would ask me what was making me so fleshy and looking so well.

"Sometimes, before I could answer quick enough, one of the children or my husband would say, 'Why, that is what Postum is doing for her'—they were all so proud and glad.

"When I recommend it to anyone I always tell them to follow directions in making Postum, as it is not good to taste if weak, but fine when it has the flavor and rich brown color." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

GOVERNOR A. O. EBERHART IS RE-ELECTED

Wilson Carries State By a Safe Margin.

Entire Republican State Ticket Has Been Elected—James Manahan Is Also a Sure Winner.

Minneapolis, Nov. 6.—Minnesota appears to have been carried by Woodrow Wilson in a three-cornered fight for the presidency, with Roosevelt a close second and the result still in doubt.

Governor Eberhart has been re-elected by a plurality ranging from 40,000 to 50,000.

The entire Republican state ticket has been elected from United States Senator Knute Nelson down, by majorities greater than those accorded the governor.

The fact that the polls closed so late in Minnesota resulted in meagre returns until a late hour. Ramsey county was apparently carried by Wilson for the presidency while Hennepin county went for Wilson with Taft a close second and Roosevelt third.

Republican Victory Complete.

The victory for the Republican state ticket is complete. State Chairman Smith stated there was no doubt of Eberhart's election by at least 40,000 and that it would possibly amount to more than that. He claimed the election of all of the Republican state candidates, including theh railroad and warehouse commissioners.

In every instance it was made evident that the strength of Roosevelt was a personal strength and not strength gained by the third party organization.

In Congressional Districts.

In the different congressional districts in Minnesota the winners have attained their places easily.

In the First, Sidney Anderson is an easy winner over his Democratic opponent, Clinton Robinson. In the Second W. S. Hammond, Democrat, wins by a handsome majority over F. F. Ellsworth, author of the resolution which made a third party ticket in Minnesota possible. In the Third, C. R. Davis wins by about 5,000 majority over his Democratic opponent, F. L. Glotzbach.

The Victory of F. C. Stevens.

The victory of F. C. Stevens in the Fourth district was one of the unexpected results. Mr. Stevens was facing a bitter fight and the Democrats had named a strong man. The complete defeat of Hugh T. Halbert is the Ramsey county answer to the third party ticket, placed in the field after the primary nominations were made.

In Hennepin county, the victory of George R. Smith was expected but its completeness was more than had been anticipated in view of the three cornered fight made against him.

In the Sixth district, C. A. Lindberg is an easy winner over his Democratic opponent. Dr. Gilkison and A. J. Volstead was elected without opposition in the Seventh.

Clarence B. Miller, Republican was an easy winner over John Jenswold in the Eighth, or Duluth district, while Halvor Steenerson wins by a reduced majority in the Ninth.

On the Republican state ticket, Knute Nelson and James Manahan, candidates for United States senator and congressman at large, respectively, win by the largest majorities.

It was not possible to completely estimate their majorities but it is in the neighborhood of from 70,000 to 80,000.

JAMES MANAHAN.

The overwhelming character of the indorsement given by the voters to Senator Nelson means that the senior senator will be elected without opposition by the next legislature.

Legislature Safely Republican.

The character of the legislature is not known now, but enough has been learned to indicate that it will be safely Republican.

While Governor Eberhart's majority is less than that given Senator Nelson and Mr. Manahan, it is greater in proportion. The governor had a strenuous struggle in the primaries and was opposed as bitterly in the election.

The third party named a candidate against him in the person of P. V. Collins, running as a Roosevelt Progressive. The strong vote polled by Roosevelt secured a larger vote for Collins than he would otherwise have received, but even with this aid, his vote is comparatively small. In addition to the candidacy of Mr. Collins, Govenor Eberhart met the opposition of P. M. Ringdal, Democratic candidate, who made a clean and an aggressive campaign. Still another opponent was E. E. Lobeck, Prohibition candidate, who has polled a good vote and David Morgan, the Socialist Labor candidate.

GOV. A. O. EBERHART.

In spite of this opposition, Governor Eberhart has come through with a clean plurality and the state administration will remain for another two years as it is.

How Twin Cities Treated Eberhart.

Governor Eberhart carried both St. Paul and Minneapolis, but by majorities less than those given him two years ago.

Returns on justices of the supreme court are difficult to obtain. Calvin S. Brown appears to have been elected chief justice. His nearest opponent is C. W. Stanton of Bemidji. Returns from the northern part of the state, where Stanton is strongest, may change the result.

Justice Holt in the Lead.

For associate justice, Justice Holt of Minneapolis has been elected, leading Knute Nelson Wins By a Large Majority.

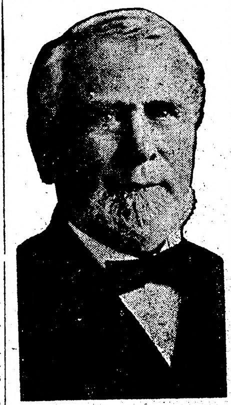
Roosevelt Is Given Place—The Governor's Plurality Ranges From 40,000 to 50,000 Votes.

the group of three candidates. There is a close fight for the other place between Justice George L. Bunn and Oscar Hallam of the Ramsey district court with the chances favoring Hallam.



SEN. KNUTE NELSON.

The closeness of the fight between Roosevelt and Wilson all over the state has been marked. At a late hour, 351 precincts gave Taft 17,501; Wilson, 20,826; Roosevelt, 20,314. These precincts were outside of Minneapolis and St. Paul. 152 precincts outside of Minneapolis and St. Paul gave Eberhart 11,396, Ringdal, 9,438; Collins, 1,865.

The strength which President Taft developed shows conclusively what might have ben done for the president had the national committee commenced its fight earlier.

The revival of Taft sentiment came late, but it was marked all along the line. Republicans voted freely for Woodrow Wilson and in Minnesota, as in other states, turned the tide to the Democratic candidate through lack of confidence in the chance of their own candidate to win.

On of the most vigorous fights for the president was made in Hennepin county. In this county, Wilson and Taft ran close, showing the results of the fight put up by Taft's organization under the direction of F. H. Carpenter. The failure of Roosevelt to negotiate more than third place shows in marked contrast to what happened here during the primaries.

London Dinners Are Shorter.

London.—Even the London city dinners are feeling the influence of the change which has come over dining habits in the last few years. Inquiries at a well-known city restaurant, famous for its feasts, have shown that the art of dining has been on an ever-increasing tendency toward shorter dinners. Quicker service and smaller menus is the demand. Good dinners are still expensive, but less expansive. The dinner of today is an interlude in the program and not the program itself.

Court Rules Are Revised.

Washington, Nov. 5.—Revolutionary changes in procedure in equity cases in federal courts throughout the United States are effected in revised rules promulgated by the supreme court of the United States. The object is to reduce the cost of litigation and to eliminate delays. The new rules were announced by Chief Justice White from the bench. One of the tasks undertaken by him when he was appointed chief justice was to reform procedure in the courts. He first revised the rules of the supreme court itself.

IN THESE DAYS OF DIVORCES

Really Nothing Remarkable in the Simple and Frank Explanation of the Small Boy.

We were walking down the street Sunday and we saw the most beautiful child sitting on the front steps of a pretty house, says Ted Robinson. His eyes were so big and blue, his curly head so golden, his innocent smile so frank and inviting that we could not resist the temptation to enter into conversation with him.

"Well, son," we said in the idiotically genial way with which an adult usually addresses a child, "how old are you?"

"Four," lisped the infant. (He didn't really lisp it, because you can't lisp when you say four; but that's the way children are supposed to do.)

"Isn't that fine!" (It would have been just as fine if he'd been three, though, or five. More idiocy.) "And whose little boy are you?"

"Mamma's li'l boy."

"Aren't you papa's little boy, too?"

"Nope."

"Why aren't you papa's little boy?"

"The decree gimme to mamma."

Then we went on our pleasant way. —Savannah Morning News.

Ever polite, his feelings were nevertheless stirred, and the best he could think of to say under the circumstances was:

BACKACHE "GETS ON THE NERVES"

Many who suffer from backache and weak kidneys are unnaturally irritable, fretful and nervous. Not only does constant backache "get on the nerves", but bad kidneys fail to eliminate all the uric acid from the system, and uric acid irritates the nerves, keeping you "on edge" and causing rheumatic, neuralgic pains. Doan's Kidney Pills cure these ills by curing the kidneys. Here's proof:

A California Case:

Mrs. E. Walsh, 1649 Tenth Avenue, San Francisco, Cal. says: "I had such sharp, shooting pains through my kidneys it seemed that a knife were being thrust into me. My back was so lame I could hardly stoop. Doan's Kidney Pills cured me after doctors failed. I have had no trouble since."

PLAY PIRATE; NEARLY DROWN

RAYMOND SIMONEAN AND JOHN KUFORD NARROWLY ESCAPE.

Boat Is Tipped While They Are Rowing to Their Island Lair.

Minneapolis.—Raymond Simoneau, aged eleven, and John Kuford, aged 10, are in a precarious condition as a result of a boyish escapade on the Mississippi river when they, with three other lads, figured in a "rocking the boat" experience.

The Simonean and Kuford boys, in company with Irving Kurke, Clarence Larson and Walter Fosler, two other boys living on the north side, had chosen "playing pirate" as the subject of the afternoon's fun, and, going to the foot of Thirty-second avenue, embarked in a small boat which had been termed by "the gang" the "pirate ship." They were to row to the middle of the river where, on an island, the rest of the boys had prepared a campfire and roasted potatoes to be enjoyed by the "pirates" late in the day.

Midway between shore and land Kurke arose in the boat and remarked that he was going to tip it and drown his followers. He began to rock the boat and before his frightened companions could make him stop, it had turned turtle, throwing the five into the river. Three of the boys, Larson, Fosler and Kurke were rescued by a man known to residents of the North Side as "Bill, the Boomman." The three lads were landed safely and their rescuer started back to get the other two who were struggling in the cold water.

The Simonean and Kuford lads were pulled on "Bill's" boat as they were about to go under for the third time. They were taken to their homes where Dr. Theodore Tennyson revived them after half an hour's work. The boys declared that hereafter their "pirate playing" stunts would be confined to the land variety.

NOTED ATTORNEY DIES.

Fails in Surviving Paralytic Stroke.

Austin.—Lafayette French, a well-known attorney of southern Minnesota, died here from the effects of a paralytic stroke which he suffered last Monday evening.

Mr. French was born Nov. 19, 1848, on a farm near Loraine township, Ohio. When he was but 5 years of age, his father died and his mother died seven years later, leaving the lad practically alone. He came directly to Austin and entered the employ of Page & Wheeler, a law firm. On Sept. 28, 1871, he was admitted to practice. Mr. French married Mary Vine Richards, daughter of William Richards, who survives her husband. To them were born three children, Maurine French, Varco of Fairview, Mont.; Lafayette French, Jr., and Inez, who is at home.

Mr. French was county attorney in 1874, and was mayor of this city in '85, '86 and '87; and president of the Minnesota State Bar association in 1909. He had practiced in United States district courts and appeared before the United States supreme court at Washington in the famous Emmons station case ten years ago.

He was a Mason, Knight Templar, a member of the B. P. O. E., A. O. U. W., M. W. A. and Court of Honor. His reputation as a criminal lawyer was not confined to this state.

ACCIDENT VICTIM

In State of Coma 72 Hours and May Not Recover.

Rochester, Minn.—For seventy-two hours Miss Susan Ripley, daughter of a prominent Rochester family, has lain in a state of coma at Stewartville as the result of being thrown out of an automobile and fears are entertained that she may never recover.

Miss Ripley with a party of young friends left Rochester Sunday afternoon for an auto ride, going to Stewartville. On the road, a culvert was reached, and as the car passed over it Miss Ripley was hurled from the rear seat over the back of the car, into the road, striking on her head. She was rendered unconscious, from which condition she has not revived.

Station Men Strike.

Albert Lea.—A strike occurred at the union station in this city when the office force, including the day and night ticket agents, refused to continue their duties under the new agent, Mr. Ellis. The trouble has been brewing for some time.

$20,000 Jewel Robbery.

St. Paul.—Mrs. Reuben Warner who is the mother of Reuben Warner of Lindeke, Warner & Son, was robbed of diamonds valued at $20,000 last Monday. Mrs. Warner missed the valuables, which were kept in a jewel box in her bedroom, when she was about to retire Monday night. The last time she saw the jewels was Monday afternoon. The police of St. Paul and Minneapolis have been working on the case all week, but say they have no clue to the robbers. They have kept the robbery a secret.

4 CENTS TO $2,000.

Final Expense Accounts Show Big Cut.

St. Paul.—Final campaign expense accounts of candidate for city, county, state and national offices, filed as the law requires, show individual expenditures ranging from 4 cents to more than $2,000, but on the whole show that the 1912 campaign has cost thousands less than the campaign of 1910, before the corrupt practices act was in force.

The smallest expenditure recorded in the reports is that of Judge Nathan Kingsley, candidate for re-election to the bench in the tenth district, whose total campaign expense was 4 cents. That was the cost of mailing his expense account in a big envelope to Julius Schmahl, secretary of state. This largest expense was that of Julius Schmahl and his committee, the total being $2,075.50.

The largest expense account in Hennepin county shown by the accounts filed was Al. P. Erickson, county auditor, is that of Harry P. Swenson, democratic candidate for county attorney, who, with his committee, spent $858.51. The next was the expense of his opponent, James Robertson, who spent $855.38. The smallest was by Miss Mae Snow, candidate for school director, who spent 10 cents for carfare and 2 cents for a stamp in addition to her fililing fee.

The accounts show that in both state and municipal campaigns all the candidates were far under the legal limit, the Hennepin county total being about one-third of the $86,224 limit. This is shown by the filing of expense statements of forty-two of the 159 candidates who filed in the county.

The republican state central committee account showed an expenditure of $2,731.11, with outstanding debts of about $4,000, as against an expenditure of $20,000 two years ago. The limit is now $10,000. Even this expenditure will leave a deficit to be made up, for the receipts were but $3,502, according to the report.

The democratic committee received $3,141 and spent $2,600.30. The fund was contributed by more than 800 persons in small amounts.

The progressive party has not completed its account, but the account of P. V. Collins, candidate for governor, showed a personal expenditure of $898 since Oct. 12. He gave as things promised, "Fulfillment of progressive platform contract with the people—all the people." Under the listing of "purpose" he entered, "Patriotism and development of Minnesota and Mankind." Under "value" he entered "One hundred cents on the dollar."

Lyndon A. Smith, attorney general, and his committee spent $2,276; Governor Eberhart, $955, and P. M. Ringdal and committee, $567.88.

IS KILLED IN "BLIND."

Grover C. Zeglin, Son of Minneapolis Man, Shot.

Minneapolis.—Grover C. Zeglin, 26 years old, son of R. Zeglin, 3621 Park avenue, and proprietor of a summer hotel at Coney Island, near Waconia, Minn., was accidentally shot by a friend while duck hunting at the island, according to reports received at his parents' home.

According to an eye witness, F. W. Bender, a brother-in-law of the dead man, Zeglin, with four others, guests of his for the duck shooting season, were in a blind. Zeglin shot a duck and sprang up to see where it landed when a man whom Mr. Bender said was Adolph Smith, whose address he did not know, and who was directly behind Zeglin, fired at some of the ducks. The charge hit Zeglin in the back of the head, instantly killing him. His body was taken to Waconia, and will be brought to Minneapolis.

Clover Yield Is Heavy.

Caledonia, Minn.—One of the biggest yields of clover seed that has been threshed in this section was on the farm of Charles Mann. It averaged eight bushels an acre. Farmers have begun to specialize in the raising of clover seed and will reap a big harvest this year. One farmer brought in a load and received a check for $1,000. Farmers of Houston county have the largest crop of potatoes ever raised in the county. More than 200,000 bushels are being held by farmers, due to inability to get refrigerator cars.

Insurance Head Resigns.

Minneapolis, Nov. 2.—Leonard K. Thompson, president of the Northwestern National Life Insurance company since its reorganization seven years ago, has resigned. John T. Baster, until now vice president and counsel, takes his place.

Duck Hunter Severely Wounded.

Bemidji, Minn., Nov. 4—In an effort to regain a falling shotgun, Edward Revoir, returning in a wagon with a party of duck hunters from Rice Lake, discharged the weagon, the contents tearing his left hand into shreds and peppering his face.

One of the pleasent after effects is to have some of the good old standpatters try to explain how it happened.

The showing made by the Progressive party would seem to indicate that the Republican party had really commited suidide at Chicago last June.

Now that the election is over and the country saved, the people should at once get busy and try to do some thing for their own direct salvat'on. In this part of the country one of the most inportant things to be done is to fight for amendments to the drainage laws that will give the taxpayers some sort of protection from unscrupulous engineers and contractors.

Duluth Herald: The Roosevelt cause has failed. And yet it has not failed, either. A high purpose, pure patriotism and warm loyality to the common good, inspired his followers. They have raised some vital issues, issues which will be considered fairly and fully. Much of what they proposed must come to pass, and we mistake greatly if they do not find in Woodrow Wilson a champion to their liking, and an effective one. For them all, tho it could not agree with them in their choice of leadership, nor one or two of their remedies for existing evils, The Herald has had and still has the utmost respect. It has so much respect for their patriotism that it is confident that in all good works for the common good, Woodrow Wilson will have no stronger supporters than they.

Risberg in St. Paul Hospital

A few days ago P. A. Risberg woke up in the morning to find that he was almost totally blind, and he at once left for the Twin Cities to consult with the best eye specialists. Word was received from him yesterday stating that he is at present in hospital at St. Paul, but in his letter he said nothing as to the condition of his eyes. His trouble seems to be due to some sort of paralysis of the optic nerves, and this is the second time he has been attacked. Everybody hopes that his present trouble will not prove very serious and that he will soon return completely recovered.

A Letter From Oregon

Fred Heiser, a former resident of here, and has a lot of friends in this vicinity, sends the following interesting letter from his new home in Oregon.

Albany, Or., Nov. 3, 1912.

Chas. Wr Latta, Holt, Minn.

Dear Sir: Enclosed find $1 to pay for another years subscription to The Northern Light. Your paper is very welcome in our new hame, as it brings us the news from our old home.

We have now got all our buildings up and feel like home again, and we all like it fine here. I am slowly improving in health. Around here they are now picking the last of the apple crop, and have more apples than they can get help to pick, so lots of them go to waste. They are paying 25 cents an hour for picking apples, and sell them at from 25 to 40 cents per bushel. The very best prunes sell for 6 cents a pound.

With very little exception we have had fine weather here up to now. Lots of roses are blooming yet, but within two or three weeks from now we are looking for the wet season to begin, and that means rain.

—F. A. Heiser.

GENEVIEVE'S GUEST PROVED RIGHT MAN

By DOROTHY BLACKMORE.

Genevieve joined her mother at the tea table beside the creeper covered trellis.

"Father has just telephoned from the office to say that he has missed his train—"

"Oh!" interrupted Mrs. Marston, with a sigh of genuine disappointment, "that is too bad. And on such a hot night, too."

"That isn't the worst of it," said Genevieve. "He has asked a friend—a Mr. Hunter Barnes of London—to meet him at Jamaica and come out for dinner and spend the night with us. He's a business associate of the London house and father feels in duty bound to entertain him. He's a perfect stranger in this country and, as father had no way to communicate with him, the poor man is likely to be wandering about anywhere this side of Timbuctoo!" Genevieve filled her cup and waited for her mother to gather the situation.

"There's nothing to do but wait," said Mrs. Marston, after a moment's reflection. "We'll postpone dinner until 7:30, and maybe your father will have found his friend somewhere."

"And maybe he won't, too," added Genevieve. "Poor soul!"

The attention of the two women was attracted to the path in front of their pretty suburban house. A man stood looking intently at the gate and bordering flower beds.

"Mother," whispered Genevieve, grasping her parent's arm none too gently. "That's he!"

"That's who?"

"Father's friend—he answers the description father gave me over the 'phone, and doesn't he look as if he were searching for some one?" Genevieve turned to the ramblers and began ostensibly to pick a cluster, in reality she wanted only to get a view of the stranger without seeming to notice him.

"He seems to be going on," said Mrs. Marston.

"But reluctantly—see. He is looking at the grounds, at the flowers. Now—he sees us and is embarrassed. I wonder what we should do? Father said he would probably turn up."

"Surely a mere passerby wouldn't stare so," remarked Mrs. Marston. "Are you quite sure your father said tall and dark?"

"Quite," replied Genevieve, rising. "And I'm going to get him."

Genevieve picked her way out from among the roses and walked straight to the hedge instead of going by the circuitous route to the path. The tall stranger was moving on, reluctantly.

"Are you—Mr. Robert Hunter Barnes?" Genevieve asked, hesitatingly.

The man turned quickly toward her, his soft hat in his hand in an instant. "No; my name is Kensington—James R.—and I must ask you to pardon my seeming rudeness in staring at your grounds. I am a landscape artist and, as I have not seen this place since I laid it out five years ago, I was anxious to know how it has done. The roses are wonderful and—you have added to them."

Genevieve was endeavoring to recover her composure after the first realization that she had made an error. "It is I who must ask your pardon. My mother and I both decided that you were my father's friend, Mr. Barnes, for whom we are looking. He is a stranger, and father described him as tall and dark. You looked like a stranger seeking a number, so—you'll pardon me?"

Kensington smiled, and as Mrs. Marston joined them he explained again his own conduct. Then he added: "I, too, am under a slight difficulty as to my dining place. Mrs. Thompson, one of your neighbors on the hill, asked me to dine with them quite informally tonight, and to come out early, if I cared to, and look at the various places I had laid out some time since.

"I went to her house and was informed by the maid at the door that she had instructions to let no one in without Mrs. Thompson's orders. Evidently the fact that she had asked me to dinner had slipped Mrs. Thompson's mind and she has gone for the day without informing the servants. They had a house robbed by a man who said he wanted to mend the clocks and had come under instruction from Mr. Thompson." Kensington laughed. "So you see how the servants regard me. I shall wait now until Mrs. Thompson returns, and then—it will be all right."

"Meantime, do come in and have a cup of tea," Mrs. Marston said, graciously. "It is quite natural on the part of the servants," she laughed as they sought the tea table.

"But I wonder where poor Mr. Barnes is," said Genevieve as they sat in a rustic seat in full view of the pathway.

"His loss is my gain," remarked Kensington, teacup in hand. "But I trust he will find you."

"Mr. Marston will be here on the next train and perhaps he will have found him," Mrs. Marston said.

Until train time, Kensington told the two women much that convinced them of his sincerity. He related to them the story of how the little settlement in which they live originated.

"It was a great, rolling cow pasture when Mr. Thompson first found it, and as he was desirous of establishing a home for himself and of surrounding himself with a few congenial neighbors, he bought the entire piece of ground—all that was left of an old estate—and asked me to come up and lay it out, being careful to place the houses so as to preserve every one of the old trees that stood in the pasture. That accounts for the irregularity of the roads and the hit-or-miss setting of the houses, but—pardon my seeming self-praise—I tried to make it artistic irregularity, and Mr. Thompson thinks I have succeeded."

"You have indeed—I just love it," Genevieve declared enthusiastically. "Oh-h, here comes father with a tall, dark man."

It was not a half hour until Mr. and Mrs. Thompson came anxiously along the road in their automobile searching both sides of the street for their guest who had been so inhospitably treated at their home.

"I can assure you Mrs. and Miss Marston have made up for the suspicion of your servants," he laughingly told Mrs. Thompson. "I have no grievance whatever," he added, looking at Genevieve. "I ask only this—that you invite me often hereafter and let me come to see my new made friends, Mrs. Thompson, as well as your two good selves."

Mrs. Thompson's eyes twinkled. She had a keen intuition and something told her that a romance had been begun between her bachelor landscape artist and Miss Marston.

"My intuition never fails me," she said to Mr. Thompson the following June when they were all busy with preparations for an out-of-door wedding, a wedding among the roses where James Kensington first saw his bride. "It never fails me, dear," she added.

PLURALITY AND MAJORITY.

A presidential election in the United States almost invariably prompts the question, what is the difference in counting election returns between a majority and a plurality? The Standard Dictionary, under the head of the word plurality gives a complete definition of the word as it is used in American politics: "The greatest of more than two numbers, whether it is or is not a majority of the whole; also, the excess of the highest number of votes cast for any one candidate over the next highest number. When a candidate for office out of 10,000 votes cast, receives 4,000 and two other candidates receive respectively 3,500 and 2,500, the first is elected by a plurality, though he has received less than a majority of the whole vote, and he is said to have a plurality of 500 votes. If the numbers are 6,000, 3,000 and 1,000 the majority is 2,000 and the plurality is 3,000."

An old alluvial digger and prospector, named Peacock, has arrived at Barberton, South Africa, with a nugget weighing 179 ounces, which he found at Kaapscheboop. The nugget is almost pure gold, there being very little gravel with it. The find has caused great excitement.

George F. Baer, the famous Philadelphia railroad man, said on his seventieth birthday:

"I agree with Professor Metchnikoff about the wisdom of the old. Professor Osler made it fashionable to decry gray hairs, but my experience has been that the old not only possess wisdom, but they seek it also."

NO MEDICINE

But Change of Food Gave Final Relief.

Most diseases start in the alimentary canal—stomach and bowels.

A great deal of our stomach and bowel troubles come from eating too much starchy and greasy food.

The stomach does not digest any of the starchy food we eat—white bread, pastry, potatoes, oats, etc.—these things are digested in the small intestines, and if we eat too much, as most of us do, the organs that should digest this kind of food are overcome by excess of work, so that fermentation, indigestion, and a long train of ails result.

Too much fat also is hard to digest and this is changed into acids, sour stomach, belching gas, and a bloated, heavy feeling.

In these conditions a change from indigestible foods to Grape-Nuts will work wonders in not only relieving the distress but in building up a strong digestion, clear brain and steady nerves. A Wash. woman writes:

"About five years ago I suffered with bad stomach—dyspepsia, indigestion. constipation—caused, I know now, from overeating starchy and greasy food.

"I doctored for two years without any benefit. The doctor told me there was no cure for me. I could not eat anything without suffering severe pain in my back and sides, and I became discouraged.

"A friend recommended Grape-Nuts and I began to use it. In less than two weeks I began to feel better and inside of two months I was a well woman and have been ever since.

"I can eat anything I wish with pleasure. We eat Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast and are very fond of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

GREEKS CARING FOR 25,000 TURKS

CROWN PRINCE CONSTANTINE AT HEAD OF VICTORIOUS FORCES ENTERS SALONIKI.

SERVIANS TAKE DIBRA.

150,000 Men Killed and Wounded in Balkin War Thus Far, According to Reports.

BULLETIN.

London, Nov. 12.—Europe is facing one of the most critical weeks in her history. It may end in a war in which the whole of Europe will be involved or it may be remembered as a week in which diplomacy succeeded in solving problems that appeared insoluble to many.

Athens, Nov. 12.—Since the fall of Saloniki the Greek troops have been occupied in erecting camps for the 25,000 Turkish prisoners, supposedly in Fort Karabur. Saturday two battalions of Greek highlanders replaced the garrison.

The full division of the Greek army, headed by Crown Prince Constantine, entered Saloniki Sunday, and proceeded direct to the Church of St. Sophia. It was the intention of King George also to enter Saloniki if time permitted to make the journey from Ghida.

Mayor Delivers Address.

The mayor of Athens has addressed a telegram of felicitation to the crown prince and commanders of the army. Following a celebration, the mayor, at the head of a monster procession, marched to the war office and expressed in the name of the people admiration for the success of the Greek army. Premier Venizelos replied that Greece was carving out a new pathway leading to a glorious future.

Bulgarians At It.

The Bulgarian attack upon the Tchatalja lines goes on unrelentingly. According to a correspondent at the front further Turkish positions have been carried, but their location has not been indicated in accordance with the invariable Bulgarian plans never to reveal information to the public. There is an unconfirmed report that Monastir has been captured. This, and the capture of Dibra, an independent town in Albania, by the Servians after heavy fighting, constitute all the military news of importance since Saturday.

War Claims 150,000.

Some idea of the bloody nature of this war may be formed from the fact that it now is estimated 150,000 men have been put out of action on both sides since the opening of hostilities. The Turkish government clearly has little hope of holding the Tchatalja lines. The dispatch of 100 Uleinas to the front with the avowed intention to stir up religious fanaticism in the army is interpreted as the counsel of despair.

Won't Countenance Surrender.

Constantinople.—The situation has taken a turn for the worse. A grave internal crisis seems to be impending. On the one hand the position of the government is seriously compromised because the army repudiates the mediation proposals. On the other hand the committee of union and progress is giving evidence of renewed activity, while Turkish feeling, both national and religious, is being worked to fever pitch by the preaching in the mosques and the impassioned language of the press.

Government Powerless.

The most serious feature of the situation is the weakness of the government in having, first, to apply for mediation to secure an armistice, later requesting mediation pure and simple, and then being virtually obliged to yield to the army which repudiated mediation.

Powers May Save Turks.

Paris.—The great powers, Great Britain, France and Russia, constituting the triple entente; and Germany, Austria and Italy, the triple alliance, are believed to be at the point of reaching an agreement to prevent the Bulgarian army from occupying Constantinople. The six governments are themselves in accord on the principle, and active exchanges are in progress as to the means to be taken to bring about this result.

Powers' Plan Broached.

One suggestion is a collective provisional occupation of Constantinople by the six powers with the consent of Turkey under the assumption that such action was necessary to protect the subjects of the respective nations and to maintain order.

The Bulgarian government appears already to have indicated that it has no intention of trying to hold Constantinople and that it would occupy the Turkish capital temporarily only—until peace had been arranged.

Preacher Eulogizes Wilson.

Princeton, N. J., Nov. 12.—President-elect Woodrow Wilson Sunday heard for the first time a pulpit tribute paid to him as the future executive of the nation. He sat in his usual pew at the First Presbyterian church with Mrs. Wilson and the Misses Jessie and Eleanor, and listened attentively to both prayer and sermon, in which divine guidance was besought for his administration. In his first prayer, Rev. Sylvester W. Beach appealed for God's protection and aid for the future president.

WESTERN CANADA'S PROSPERITY

NOT A BOOM, BUT DUE TO NATURAL DEVELOPMENT.

One of the largest banks in Holland has been doing a big business in Western Canada, and Mr. W. Westerman, the President, on a recent visit into the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, expressed himself as being much impressed with present conditions and prospects, and was convinced that the great prosperity of the Dominion was not a boom, but merely the outcome of natural developments.

Not only has money been invested largely in Western Canada by the Holland Banks, but by those of Germany, France, as well as Great Britain. Not only are these countries contributing money, but they are also contributing people, hard headed, industrious farmers, who are helping to produce the two hundred million bushels of wheat and the three hundred million bushels of the other small grains that the Provinces of the West have harvested this season.

During the past fiscal year there came into Canada from the United States 133,710; from Austria Hungary 21,651; from Belgium 1,601; Holland 1,077; France 2,094; Germany 4,664; Sweden 2,394; Norway 1,692; and from all countries the immigration to Canada in that year was 354,237. From the United States and foreign countries the figures will be increased during the present year.

Most of these people have gone to the farms, and it is no far look to the time when the prophecy will be fulfilled of half a billion bushel crop of wheat in Western Canada. Advertisement.

RINGWORM ON SHOULDER

Box 183, Downey, Cal.—"My little boy of eight years had what they called ringworm on his shoulder and the back of his neck. It started in a small pimple like a blister and kept getting larger till it was the size of a dollar. One place was as large as three silver dollars. They were round and a mass of watery blisters. Wherever the water would touch it would cause another blister, commencing another sore and so on. It was very red and angry and would itch and burn so badly that he could not sleep or, in fact, sit still at times. He would cry when I would touch it. When he would rub or scratch it it would look like chopped meat. His clothing irritated it. I tried many remedies, but it kept spreading and itching. This was all before I used Cuticura Soap and Ointment on it. After the first treatment with Cuticura Soap and Ointment he was much relieved, and they cured him in one month.

"My husband is a plumber and his hands get scratched and cut, which means sores if not treated, so he washes with Cuticura Soap and puts Cuticura Ointment on his hands every night, and that keeps them fine." (Signed) Mrs. Harry West, Apr. 5, '12.

TAFT TO PUSH TRUST SUITS

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE HOPES TO FINISH BEFORE MARCH 4.

Steel and Harvester Cases Hanging Fire and Others Undecided.

Washington, Nov. 12.—The department of justice is making a strenuous effort to push, as close to conclusion as possible, all the pending anti-trust prosecutions of the Taft administration for President-elect Wilson and his attorney general when they take the oath of office on March 4.

The taking of testimony in most of the suits will have been completed, it is believed, and the cases will be before the courts for decision before the Republican administration expires.

While the issues have been joined in the two biggest pending cases—the suits against the Steel and Harvester trusts—it is not thought they will be ready for decision by March 4. The Steel suit probably will extend well into the new administration but officials foresee the end of the testimony and arguments in the Harvester case by April or May.

Several of the suits against retail lumber dealers' associations regarded as among the most important cases, because they involve the extent of the rights of "Middlemen" in commerce, will in all probability be ready for determination before President Taft retires.

The suit against the "Towing trust" on the Great Lakes, is awaiting the decision of the district court at Cleveland, while it is believed that the United States supreme court may render its opinion in the "Hard coal" suit and the "Cotton corner" suit today.

RUSSIAN-AUSTRIAN WAR.

St. Petersburg Report Says War Is Imminent.

London, Nov. 12.—Press and public opinion in St. Petersburg, according to a dispatch to the Daily Mail from the Russian capital, consider a conflict between Russia and Austria imminent, if Austria continues to threaten Servia.

Vienna.—There is much excitement here over the possibility of war between Austria and Russia, which is talked of. Reports that mobilization is imminent, however, are officially denied. On the contrary it is said Austria will wait until the war is ended before opening formal negotiations with Servia.

Bandits Secure $2,200.

Grand Forks, N. D., Nov. 12.—Seventeen men were held up by two masked robbers in a pool room at Rolette, N. D., and $2,200 was taken from them. The robbery was pulled off in true wild west style, and the two men have made a successfull getaway. Entering the pool room where it is understood a poker game was in progress, the two robbers leveled revolvers at the crowd and told them to throw up their hands. Into the air went seventeen pairs of hands. The victims were then lined up in a row at one side of the room. One robber stood on guard with two revolvers covering the crowd, while the other robber passed along the line. From one man $1,500 was secured, while from the other sixteen victims enough was secured to make a total of $2,200.

Bomb Exploded at Show.

New York, Nov. 12.—More than 250 persons, many of them women and children, were thrown into a wild panic and seven persons were seriously injured when a bomb was exploded at the exit to an Italian moving picture show house. The show was in progress and the hall filled when the explosion took place. Myirs Flalofrea, 19, a marble cutter, was arrested. The police say that he placed the bomb and that revenge was the motive. It is not believed any of the injured will die.

REGULATING THE STOMACH

That Important Organ Works According to the Quality of the Blood That Is Furnished to It.

There is the most intimate relation between the condition of the blood and the activity of the stomach. The blood depends upon the stomach for a large part of its nourishment; while every act of digestion, from the time the food enters the stomach until it is digested and assimilated by the blood, needs plenty of pure, well-oxidized blood. The stomach works only according to the quality of the blood.

The most common cause of indigestion is anæmia, or lack of blood. Indeed there is not a single disturbance of the health of the body nor any form of exhaustion or lowered vitality, that may not lead to stomach trouble. Disordered blood is the one common cause of indigestion. Thin, impure blood weakens the muscles of the stomach and lessens the product of the glands which furnish the digestive fluids.

Nothing will more promptly cure indigestion than plenty of pure, well-oxidized blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People increase the red corpuscles, the oxygen-carriers of the blood, until the blood is rich and red. A thorough trial of these pills gives a hearty appetite, perfect digestion, strength and health.

Mrs. Emma M. Mayne, of No. 635 Second avenue, Clinton, Iowa, says: "I had just worked myself out bringing up a family of five children and, while in this run-down condition, I took sick with some kind of stomach trouble. I doctored with several physicians and saw a specialist in Chicago but received little help. I could not eat anything with relish and could not sleep. I would have deathly sick spells and would vomit. I had terrible headaches and dizzy spells. I got very thin and my friends thought I was going into consumption. I doctored for a year or so without help. While visiting a niece she told me that she took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, so I tried them. They soon helped me and a few boxes entirely cured me."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50c. per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

"I know you said tomorrow mornin'," responded the girl, "but me mother she told me to come tonight, 'cause she was afraid you might be gone away by tomorrow mornin'."

"I certainly should not go without paying my laundry bill," said Miss Philis sharply. "No respectable woman would do such a thing."

"Oh, yes, ma'am, they would," replied the child knowingly. "There's lots of respectable ladies does."

PRESIDENT-ELECT WILL REST

INTENDS TO WAIT A WHILE BEFORE TALKING.

Princeton University Faculty Congratulate Governor at Reception.

Princeton, N. J., Nov. 11.—President-elect Woodrow Wilson intends to follow out his "listening policy" for several weeks before making any announcements of important matters of state.

He said he had decided to go away next week on a vacation of three or four weeks, during which time he would be out of reach of political callers.

The place where he will go will be announced later. It is probable that he will make known little about the policy of his administration before Jan. 1.

Governor Wilson said he was in need of rest and intended to get himself in good physical condition for the session of the New Jersey legislature beginning the first of the year, when he will carry the twofold burden of a legislative program for the state and the preliminary arrangements for his presidential administration.

Governor Wilson, Friday night, had his first chance to enjoy the congratulations of his personal friends. This came at an informal reception for him at the home of Professor Winthrop M. Daniels, public utilities commissioner of the state and head of the department of economics in the university. Many of the so-called "old guard" in the Princeton faculty, the men who were intimately associated with Woodrow Wilson in his administration as head of the university, greeted him as president-elect.

The Saturday football game here between Princeton and New York university had enough attractive power to draw the governor away from duties in the afternoon.

T. R. GETS CALIFORNIA.

Has Plurality of 751, but Contest May Yet Reach the Courts.

San Francisco, Nov. 11.—With 70 small precincts to hear from the vote of California on president follows: Roosevelt, 281,369; Wilson, 280,618; Roosevelt's plurality, 751. The totals were compiled from corrected official returns from the county seats.

The 79 precincts remaining unreported are all in remote regions. It is probable that the vote of many of them will not be known before the official canvass.

Not all of the Roosevelt electors may have won. The name of Lieutenant Governor Albert J. Wallace, which headed the Roosevelt electoral ticket, was scratched by many voters.

The final disposition of California's thirteen electoral votes may be decided by the courts.

Train Robber Shot Dead.

Redding, Cal., Nov. 11.—The north bound Shasta limited, the Southern Pacific coast train de luxe, was held up and robbed and one bandit was killed at Delta, 30 miles north of here. Two companions of the dead bandit escaped with the registered mail. None of the passengers were injured. A plucky brakeman nearly frustrated the robbers and accounted for the one killed.

McGovern's Lead 6,500 Votes.

Milwaukee, Nov. 11—With two counties yet to be heard from McGovern had a lead of approximately 6,500.

New Injunction Rule.

Washington, Nov. 11.—In promulgating the first revision of the equity rules of federal courts in the last 50 years the supreme court of the United States prohibited the granting of preliminary injunctions without notice to the opposite party and restricted the granting of temporary restraining orders. The court embodied in the new rule many of the points of the Clayton anti-injunction bill, for which labor leaders have been fighting, which has passed the house and waits in the senate.

There now seems to be no doubt but that the Balkan States will have for Thanksgiving. No civilized nation has any objection to offer.

Mr. Wilson has three marriageable daughters, and the society leaders are already planning for some weddings in the White House during the Wilson regime as president. It is a pity that society has no conscience along these lines.

President Taft has issued his last official Thanksgiving proclamation, and designates Thursday, the 28th inst, as Thanksgiving. This year, the American people have a lot to be thankful for, and probably all of us could find something if we look for it.

President-elect Wilson 's receiving all kinds of gratuitous advice these days and accepts it all with polite attention. The republican newspapers are anxiously advising him not to call an extra session of congress to revise the tariff. Perhaps one extra session will be necessary to undo the evils of Taft's two extra sessions —the Payne-Aldrich tarriff bill and Canadian reciprocity.

The old machine politicians of the Repuplican party put in a few months of fierce denunciation of the Progressives and their platform, but they now try to pat them on the back and say, "Let us be friends." The Progressives, however, are not likely to again affiliate with the G. O. P. unless the old gang shall be entirely turned out, which is about equivalent to saying that the aforesaid G. O. COURSE OF SICK MENTALITY

One Woman's Idea of the Phases Through Which Those Afflicted Passed to the End.

A lady well known in England writes to a London newspaper as follows:

What are the phases that the suffragist goes through before she reaches the state of mind which enables her to break windows, set theaters on fire and throw hatchets at cabinet ministers?

Temperamentally she is the "splendid enthusiast!" A great "ideal" appeals to her! In "single-minded" devotion to her ideal, she decides to give her life to it. She dwells on the one idea to the exclusion of all other aspects of life, until the continual focusing of the mind on her one object produces a falsified vision. The correcting ideas, never being allowed to come into play, are atrophied and the mental balance is destroyed. Now comes a longer or shorter stay at the half-way house of fanaticism, until the tired and despondent "social reformer" reaches the final stage of monomania. This is the road along which, in the company of a good many noble women and men, the suffragist now drags her weary feet, producing disruption, hatred, violence and retaliation instead of furthering the cause she started with such splendid devotion to carry to victory.

Long-deferred justice has driven her into mental aberration!—the pity of the waste of such valuable material! It is the finest and most sensitive instruments which get out of tune the quickest!

HAD A RIGHT TO THE SPOT

Shirt Waist Peddler Easily Proved That It Was Most Valuable Place for Him.

Missouri was not the New York policeman's native home, nevertheless "showing" did him some good. He had undertaken to settle who considered a certain spot on the pavement worth purchasing at the price of a bloody nose. His livelihood, according to the banana man, depended upon his standing at that particular spot, and the shirt waist peddler was equally positive that if he moved on starvation would be his lot. The policeman's prayer for light was cut short by the arrival of a woman who wanted to buy a waist.

"I wear No. 38," she said. "Here is a waist that I like, but it looks like a mighty small 38."

"Try it on," urged the peddler.

"I can't, right here in the street," said she.

"Just step into this hall," said the peddler. "and knock on the door at the left. The woman will let you try it on there."

His look of triumph cowed the banana man and convinced the policeman. "See?" he said. "That is why I have to stand here. I meet a lot of customers like that woman, and it isn't every place where I can make arrangements for them to come in and try on."

The banana man moved on.

HIS TIME TO COME.

Smith and Jones were discussing the question of who should be the head of the house—the man or the woman. "I am the head of my establishment," said Jones. "I am the breadwinner. Why shouldn't I be?" "Well," replied Smith, "before my wife and I were married we made an agreement that I should make the rulings in all major things, my wife in all the minor." "How has it worked?" queried Jones. Smith smiled. "So far," he replied, "no major matters have come up."

GUARD THE WHITE HOUSE.

Although the White House is a government institution, the honor of protecting the chief executive and his household during the sleeping hours develves upon a specially selected corps of Washington police. No. 1600 Pennsylvania avenue is the only residence in America which is protected by city police year in and year out. The departments require the service of fourscore men as night watchmen.

PAPA'S WORST.

Willie—Did your mother or your father punish you when you were young?

Tommie—Both.

"How did your father punish you?"

"He used to sing to me."

NOT EQUAL OF OLD WONDER

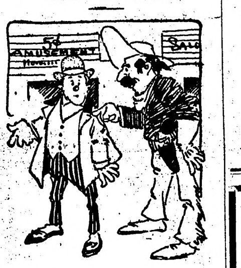
Martin Sheridan, Famed in Athletics, Fails to Muscle Malcolm Ford's Old Dumbbell.

While Jim Thorpe is being showered with honors as the best all around athlete in the world, there are many old-timers who refuse to believe that the wonderful Indian could defeat some of the old champions. A story was told that shows how the late Malcolm W. Ford is esteemed by those who knew him when he was the leading as well as the first of the great all around performers.

Martin Sheridan, the holder of the record of the A. A. U. all around competition, was the man to bring Ford's admirer to light. When Martin was at his best he dropped into a cafe on Nassau street and was introduced to the proprietor. The convention turned on athletic feats and the proprietor told how Ford was a frequent visitor at his place. There was a high and wide bar in the cafe and the man who owned the place asked Martin if he could jump over it. While Martin was measuring the obstacle with his eye the cafe man said, "Ford used to leap that easy."

"Well, replied Martin, "if Ford jumped it, so can I," and over he leaped. That was some evidence, but not enough to convince Ford's old friend that he had met a better man than the old champion. He brought out a dusty old dumbbell and laid it on the bar with a request that Sheridan muscle it. This time the Irish champion was stumped, for, strain as he would, he could not lift the weight from the bar. It is up to Martin now to introduce the newest wonder in the all around ranks to the Nassau street cafe and have the Indian submitted to the Malcolm Ford tests.—New York Times.

DIDN'T SUIT HIM.



Rooter—It was a great game. Neither side could make a run.

Grunter—That kind of game wouldn't suit me. I want to get a run for my money.

FAMILY OF GREAT SAILORS.

Admiral Sir Archibald Berkeley Milne, the English commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, is the third generation in his family to attain a high naval rank. His grandfather was Sir David Milne, whose career began with his participation in the relief of Gibraltar towards the close of the eighteenth century. The present commander's father was himself commander-in-chief on the Mediterranean station, and ultimately was made an admiral of the fleet. Sir Archibald has been in the navy since he was fourteen, and has taken part in more than one engagement on land, having been wounded in the Zulu war while acting as naval aside-de-camp to Lord Chelmsford.

RING IN OLD TREE.

Walking in the woods near Livingston, N. J., two young farmers came upon an old tree which had been split in half by lightning. While examining the tree the youths were surprised to see something glistening in the wood. With some difficulty they succeeded in digging out a gold band wedding ring. The circle bore the inscription, "To Julia Henderson from John, May 17, 1879." It is thought that some visitor lost the ring many years ago when the tree was but a sapling and that it became imbedded in the trunk.

HER REASON.

Mistress—Well, I'm sorry you want to leave me, Mary. But what's your reason?

(Mary keeps silent.)

Mistress—Something private?

Mary—(suddenly) — No, mum; please, mum, he's a lance corporal.—Illustrated Bits.

Parents should take an active interest in the welfare of their children at school. Only through Co-operation with the instructor, can the best results be obtained. Parents should see that their children's assignments for Home Work are actually studied. The instructor can compel children to take home books but cannot compel them to study at home; hence the necessity for cooperation in that respect.

BATTLE CLOSE TO TURKEY'S CAPITAL

SULTAN'S ARMY MAKING LAST DESPERATE STAND AGAINST BULGARIAN FORCES.

TROOPS ARE FORWARDED

All Day Long, Constantinople Crowds Listen to Booming of Cannon—Moslem Ships Take Part in Artillery Duel.

Constantinople, Nov. 19.—The great battle between the Bulgarians and Turks is on all along the line of the Tchatalja fortifications. Nazim Pasha, the Turkish commander in chief, sent the following dispatch:

"The battle which commenced yesterday morning with an attack by Bulgarian infantry lasted until one hour after sunset. The enemy, who advanced chiefly facing our right wing and our center was repulsed by our infantry and artillery fire. Three Bulgarian batteries were destroyed."

Heavy Guns Heard.

All through the day the sound of the heavy guns, booming distantly was heard in Constantinople. It ceased only with darkness. The firing along the entire line evidently was preparatory to an infantry attack.

The Turkish batteries replied vigorously. The Turkish ships in the sea of Marmora shelled the Bulgarian positions. Undoubtedly the fleet in the Black sea also took part in the engagement, though details from those points are lacking.

In the afternoon the wind shifted and it seemed for a time as though the battle had ended but again the booming was heard and the movement of troops could be observed not far from the very gates to the capitol. A detachment of several thousand from the Tchatalja lines was replaced by fresh troops who had been held in reserve near the city.

The refugees behind the lines began breaking camp early in the day and moved back toward Constantinople. The Greek villagers, who heretofore had remained admirably indifferent to events, prepared to desert their homes.

While calm prevailed, there was a deadly tension in the knowledge that the fate of the capital, the Turkish army and those who waited anxiously in Constantinople, were at stake.

Several members of the legations and other foreign residents witnessed the artillery duel which they describe as magnificent, and the shelling from height to height across Bimyua Chekmedye lake and over the plains towards the north. The flashes of the guns on both sides were visible to observers over miles of low country.

Within the city every military precaution was taken. Pickets were posted at various points and patrols guarded the streets. The ambassadors held a meeting at the foreign ministry with the commanders of the Ottoman gendarmeric and advised for the safety of the foreigners.

It decided that detachments for the protection of foreign institutions will be landed at dawn today. They will remain concealed in the buildings and will only co-operate with the local Turkish forces should assistance be required.

The Austrian ambassador, Marquis De Pallavicini, notified the porte of this determination, but emphasized the friendly character of the measures undertaken, explaining that they were in the interests of the safety of foreign subjects and institutions.

The sanitary board at a meeting yesterday urged that steps be taken to prevent the armies now facing each other at Tchatalja from entering the capitol owing to the cholera epidemic. The resolutions to that effect were proposed by the British delegate.

Defrauding Plot.

Cleveland, Nov. 19.—In a raid on the offices of Horace D. Hastings & Co., 866-870 Rockefeller building, here, federal officials arrested F. D. Minyard, the manager, on a charge of using the mails to defraud in connection with the operations of F. D. Minyard & Co., brokers of Cincinnati. The officers said the raid was to be simultaneous with that in other cities.

Jury Debates Over 72 Hours.

St. Louis, Nov. 19.—Weary and haggard from more than 72 hours' strain, the jury that heard the evidence in the case of E. G. Lewis, publisher and promoter, charged with using the mails to defraud, had not been able to arrive at a verdict.

U. S. to Take Precautions.

Washington, Nov. 19.—The United States public health service is drawing tighter its lines of precaution on the Atlantic coast.

Wilson Nearing Bermudas.

On board Steamship Bermudian at sea, Nov. 19.—By wireless via Sagaponack, N. Y.—President-elect Wilson spent a quiet Sunday on the steamer nearing the Bermudas. He was up early and walked the deck for a long while in the morning. During the afternoon he read in the ship's library and took a long nap in his cabin. The weather continues fair and the sea smooth. Governor Wilson, on his arrival probably will go directly to his cottage at Salt Kettle.

GENERAL DIMITRIEFF

When General Savoff ordered his troops to take the Turkish positions at Kirk Kilisseh, it was "Napoleon" Dimitrieff who received the command and carried it out with a vigor that swept the enemy completely off their feet.

U. S. BESTS "BATHTUB TRUST"

FIGHT WAS BEGUN IN MARYLAND.

Court Holds "License Agreement" In Violation of Sherman Law.

Washington, Nov. 19.—The government has won its suit in the United State supreme court in the so-called "bath tub trust." The court held that the "license agreement" of enameled ware manufacturers was in violation of the Sherman anti-trust law.

The fight against the enameled ware manufacturers was begun by the government in the United States district court of Maryland, it being charged that the fifty defendants named had entered into a combination to restrain interstate trade in sanitary enameled ironware and had attempted to monopolize that trade. Sixteen of the defendants were corporations.

One of the individual defendants was Edwin L. Wayman, with whom the corporate defendants and their official were charged with having entered into illegal agreements, in effect licenses, for the use of a patented enameling tool. Wayman was to refund part of the license fee if the manufacturers had not violated any conditions of the agreements, among these conditions being one that they would not sell to any jobber who does not sign a contract not to buy from anyone other than the corporate defendants; and another that they would not sell at a lower price or on more attractive terms than those named in a schedule of prices attached to the agreement.

The lower court held that the agreements destroyed competition and fixed prices in violation of the Sherman law, and, furthermore, that the patent on the tool made the agreements lawful.

The lower court prohibited the defendants from attempting further to restrain trade by means of these agreements, pronounced illegal.

Justice McKenna, in announcing the decision of the supreme court, called attention to the effectiveness of the combination made possible among enamel ware manufacturers, through Wayman's plan to grant licenses on his improvement for enameling.

The decision marked an epoch in anti-trust decisions, because it sustained the government's contention that a violation of the Sherman anti-trust law could not be concealed behind the patent laws of the country. The decision of the lower court was upheld throughout as to the main defendants and the Colwell Lead company, which claimed it was not engaged in interstate commerce.

Settlement of Home Rule.

London, Nov. 19.—An amicable arrangement of the home rule quarrel in the house of commons was brought about when the dispute as to the government method of procedure, which led to such disorder last week, was settled. The government announces its intention of reaching the end it desired by a more roundabout means and the Unionists, having made good their demand for the observance of precedents, raised no objection.

BULGARIANS MEET STIFF RESISTENCE

ADVANCE ON CHATLJA LINE AT EXPENSE OF HEAVY SACRIFICES.

CHOLERA KILLS SCORES.

Refugees In Constantinople Die By Thousands—Early Arrangement of Armistice Probable.

London, Nov. 18.—Bulgaria's terms of peace to Turkey, as reported at Vienna and sent from that city by the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, consist of seven stipulations.

Included in the first stipulation is the surrender of Tchatalja army and its withdrawal, guarded by Bulgarians.

The second provides for the evacuation by the Turks of Adrianople, Scutari, Monastir and Janina.

The third calls for payment of a war indemnity.

The fourth demands the surrender of conquered territory.

The fifth calls for the internationalization of Constantinople.

The sixth provides for opening the Dardanelles and making Saloniki a free port.

As the censorship permits no news to come from the front the situation at the scene of the fighting in the Balkans is more perplexing than ever.

Various reports have drifted in, however; among them that Adrianople has fallen, that the Bulgarians had captured Hademkeui, the headquarters of the Turkish commander-in-chief, that Nazim Pasha had capitulated and that the Bulgarians, either by sea or land, had reached the vicinity of Kilos, on the Black sea coast, a short distance from Constantinople. These reports still are without confirmation.

A vague dispatch is published at Sofia stating that six forts along the Tchatalja lines have been captured after what are described as heavy sacrifices on the part of the Bulgarians.

All reports previously published through the Reichpost of Vienna or emanating from other sources, go to show that the Bulgarians are having no easy time.

What, perhaps, is of graver import than the progress of the hostilities in southeastern Europe, however, is the revelation of the tremendous ravages cholera is making, not only among the destitute refugees who daily are dying in thousands in Constantinople, but among the Turkish troops.

A Constantinople dispatch to the Cologne Gazette declares that Bulgaria has abandoned her intentions to enter Constantinople, being thus advised by Russia and Great Britain. Though the report that an armistice already has been arranged has not been confirmed, all indications point in that direction.

Turks Fighting Well.

Vienna.—The correspondent of the Neus Frie Press telegraphs his paper as follows:

"The Turks are fighting with the utmost bravery and desperation. Every soldier is fighting not for the success of the whole army, but for his own individual existence."

BANKING RESOURCES.

Exceed In Four Years Record In Any Similar Period In History of Country.

Washington, Nov. 18.—The banking resources of the United States during the last four years have exceeded by billions the record of any similar period in the history of the nation, declares Lawrence O. Murray, comptroller of the currency.

During the four years ending June 1, 1912, the resources of all banks in the country—national, states and private—increased from $19,583,000,000 to $25,985,000,000 or an increase of $5,403,000,000. The nearest approach to this enormous figure was the $4,413,000,000 increase for the four years ending June, 1904, as compared with the previous four-year period.

Individual deposits likewise broke all records, increasing from 1908 to 1912 by $4,239,000,000. Loans and discounts also established a new record, increasing by $3,515,000,000 since June, 1908.

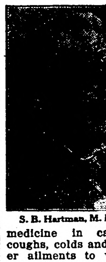
Socialist Mayor Goes to Jail.

Little Falls, N. Y., Nov. 18.—Mayor George R. Lunn of Schnectady spent the night in the Herkimer jail. He refused to pay the $50 fine imposed upon him in the local recorder's court for violating a city ordinance, and chose to serve the sentence of 50 days in jail pending the perfection of an appeal. On leaving the local court room, Mayor Lunn assisted to the automobile that conveyed him to Herkimer, Walvriac Bugajcjn, a woman who was bound over for the grand jury on a charge of stabbing Officer Kennedy in a riot at the Phoenix mills.

Child Labor Law Is Upheld.

Chicago, Nov. 18.—Constitutionality of the child labor law was upheld by Municipal Judge Sabath in a verbal opinion delivered in the cases of Wm. E. German and George W. [illegible] derer, theatrical managers, charged with employing children on the stage. Both of the defendants were found guilty of having violated the statute. The motion for a new trial was set for Nov. 30. The effect of this decision will be that no child under the age of 16 years can appear on the stage in Chicago.

Is Peruna a Laxative?



S. B. Hartman, M. D.

I am in receipt of a letter from a mechanic who is at the head of a prosperous household. Peruna has been used in his family for a good many years. He writes as follows:

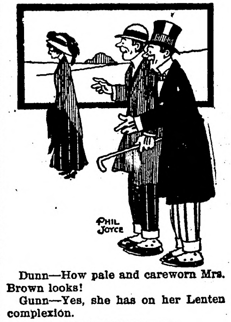
"As you know, we have used Peruna in our home for a number of years. We find it a reliable household medicine in catarrhal conditions, coughs, colds and grip, and many other ailments to which the family is subject. But since the change in the formula of Peruna I do not find it quite as useful to myself. My bowels are naturally very active. I cannot take a cathartic of any sort. It does me injury to do so. The old Peruna contained no cathartic ingredient and was therefore a very useful medicine to me. But I notice that the new Peruna has a slight laxative action, which almost makes it prohibitory for me to use. I was wondering if there was not some way in which I could obtain the old Peruna as you used to make it."

To this letter I made the following reply: "Yes, the new Peruna does contain a laxative element. You should therefore take the old Peruna (Ka-tar-no) which has no laxative quality. While prescribing the old Peruna I found it quite necessary frequently to prescribe the laxative Manalin in connection with it. Therefore Manalin was combined with Peruna, in order to meet those cases that require a laxative. But in case no laxative is required the objection to the new Peruna you speak of arises. Many of the people who used to take the old Peruna found difficulty in taking the new Peruna. To meet those cases I am having manufactured the old Peruna under the name of Katarno, and if you are anxious to get the old Peruna exactly as it used to be made you can do so."

Pe-ru-na, Man-a-lin and La-cu-pia manufactured by the Pe-ru-na company, Columbus, Ohio. Sold at all drug stores.

SPECIAL NOTICE:—Many persons inquire for The Old-time Peruna. They want the Peruna that their Fathers and Mothers used to take. The old Peruna is now called Katarno. If your druggist or dealer does not keep it for sale write the Katarno Company, Columbus, Ohio, and they will tell you all about it.

AN ARTISTIC DEVOTEE.



Dunn—How pale and careworn Mrs. Brown looks!

Gunn—Yes, she has on her Lenten complexion.

A PENALTY OF AGE

The tendency of advancing years to restrict activity and exercise is responsible for the constipated condition of most elderly people. The wear of years impairs the action of the bowels and the digestive organs are more sensitive to the demands upon them and rebel more quickly. Cathartics and purgatives are violent and drastic in their action and should not be used to correct constipation. A mild, yet positively effective remedy, and one that is recommended by physicians as well as by thousands who have used it, is the compound of simple laxative herbs with pepsin prescribed by Dr. W. B. Caldwell over thirty years ago and now sold by druggists everywhere under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Dr. Caldwell wants everyone troubled with constipation to try Syrup Pepsin and will send a trial bottle, free of charge, to all who write for it. Address Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 West St., Monticello, Ill. Adv.

Reading Test

Would Keep Out Many Honest Toilers

By MICHAEL BROWN, New York

I AM OPPOSED to any reading test for immigrants because it would keep out of this country millions of honest toilers, good and useful men and women who deserve an opportunity in life and who have been deprived of it through no fault of their own.

Illiteracy, as every one knows, is the result of oppression, and it would appear poor Americanism, indeed, to close the doors of our country, which has maintained the high doctrine that the oppressed and persecuted peoples of all lands should find an asylum here.

Labor omnia vincit. Men of brawn are far more important than the men of brain in the building of our railroads, subways, harbors. Every able-bodied immigrant coming to our country enriches it by his honest labor, whether it be in factory or mine, or as trench digger. On the other hand, American ideals may suffer rudely at the hands of one who possesses all the intellectual qualifications, but is devoid of that which is far more essential—true nobility of character, such as we often find among the illiterate class.

Have the supporters of and the agitators for the educational test considered that the marvelous growth of this country and its prosperity, unequaled in the history of the world, are due to the liberal immigration laws?

Some of our best citizens have sprung from parents who, had they been required to pass any kind of educational test, would surely have been excluded from the country. Our democratic ideas, together with the educational opportunities afforded immigrants and their children, do more to educate them than all the educational tests in the world could accomplish. Under our system of public school education the second generations of immigrants become perfectly assimilated. What is rather to be deplored, however, is the fact that the second generation, like the born Americans, refuse to follow the occupations of their fathers, but seek lighter vocations. This is another argument in favor of the immigrants who are satisfied to do the work which the native born are loth to perform.

The claim that because people lack the opportunities in their own country they are therefore inferior to ourselves would be most dangerous if accepted. It not only deals a death blow to liberty, of which we have boasted in the past, but it is a concession to a decadent spirit and to antiquated and bigoted ideas.

President Eliot of Harvard properly declared that the only questions which should be asked of an immigrant are, Is he healthy, strong and desirous of earning a good living? This, to my mind, is an expression of true Americanism. And, like Dr. Eliot, I believe that a reading test should be applied when the foreigner proposes to become a citizen and not before.

Man Had Never Seen the Ocean

By E. C. Hawtrey, St. Louis, Mo.

Not long ago I was talking with a noted and successful lawyer of a city in the interior of the nation, and was astonished to hear him say that he had never had a glimpse of the ocean. He explained it on the ground that he was a creature of habit; he never left home except on pressing business and then but for short distances. To travel means the breaking up of his regular habits and hence he had viewed none of nature's grandest sights.

The explanation sounded plausible to me, but a friend who was with me at the time and who knew the distinguished attorney better than I remarked as we left his presence that there was another and a stronger reason why he had never looked upon the salt sea waves.

"That old duffer," quoth my friend, "simply lied as to his real motives. I can tell you why he has never seen the tossing waves or heard the Atlantic's roar—he is too miserably stingy to pay the railroad fare to the coast. That's the sole reason and not because he is so averse to travel. If there were any way to decide the bet I'd wager you fifty plunks even up that he'd take the first train to the seashore if somebody would pay the expenses of the trip."

Fresh Air Leads to Good Health

By G. H. Goodwin, M. D. Washington, D. C.

Dr. Neff, director of the department of health and charities, Philadelphia, has issued a bulletin on the importance of fresh air. Pure air is as essential to the health of human beings as food or water. Once this sensible slogan could be gotten through the mind of the public the sooner would all have general good health.

Disease germs, states the bulletin, abound in the dust-laden air of poorly ventilated rooms, cars, factories and public meeting places. The antidote against these disease germs is pure air and plenty of it. It would be a wise move for all persons to always lower the top of one window in each room, no matter how cold the weather, for it is a fact little known that fresh air will heat quicker than will stale air.

There is no danger of taking cold from the fresh air if the window be lowered from the top. Fresh air, plenty of it, in the eating, the sleeping and the reading room is the enemy of disease.

Threfore iet us all practice this simple precaution and permit plenty of fresh air to enter all of our rooms.

Aviation Not to be Done Away With

By J. K. Taylor, Baltimore, Md.

Aviation will soon be a lost art unless the aviators invent some means of keeping ahead of the fatalitites. There will always be more aviators than fatalitites.

Aviation, despite the fatalitites, will increase and inprove.

There is in the human breast an almost divine something that perpetually defies fate, and this divine something is conspicuous in aviation and in everything that makes for progress.

It is a gift of the Almighty—a gift without which the world would remain as stationary as the civilization of Egypt.

So, despite the awful harvest of the air, the human race may expect as much perfection in aerial navigation as has been attained in the navigation of the high seas.

SEVEN SENATOR BURIED.

Amendment Fails to Carry by 47,856 Votes—Mill Road Tax Wins.

St. Paul. — The "seven-senator" amendment was badly beated by the voters of Minnesota in the state election last week. This measure, which was designed to cut down the representation of the large counties in the state senate, failed of a majority in nearly every county, and a big negative vote rolled up against it shows that its injustice appealed to voters in every section of the state, in spite of the campaign made in the rural counties for its passage. Out of seventy-four counties which have reported, only six gave the seven-senator bill a majority. They are Lac qui Parle, Martin, Nicollet, Olmsted, Waseca and Watonwan. There are twelve counties still to report.

The total vote of seventy-four counties was 306,935, and each amendment needed 153,468 to have a majority. The vote on the seven-senator bill in these counties was: Yes, 105,612; no, 70,577. There were 130,846 not voting on the proposition, and therefore counted in the negative. The affirmative vote fell 47,856 short of a majority.

The 1-mill road tax amendment and the 5 per cent railroad gross earnings tax have carried with good majorities. The 1-mill road tax, amendment No. 1, in the seventy-four counties received 172,144 votes, a margin of 18,676. The railroad tax measure received 162,667, a margin of 9,199. Both measures will increase their majorities on the twelve counties still to make official reports. The missing ones are: Becker, Blue Earth, Brown, Cook, Lake, Le Sueur, Lyon, Marshall, Mower, Otter Tail, Rice and Sherburne.

THANKSGIVING DAY PROCLAMATION

Issued by Governor Eberhart.

The return of another Thanksgiving season finds the people of Minnesota with more cause for sincere gratitude toward the Supreme Giver of Good Gifts than at any other period in the history of the state, for at no time in that history has there been larger and more widespread prosperity, and more convincing evidence of marked advance along the lines of right thinking and humane and unselfish conduct, tending to the mental and spiritual uplift of this great commonwealth.

Many of the great sociological problems of the hour are being seriously studied and gradually worked out in this state, while encouraging progress is being made along all lines of material development.

It is fitting, therefore, in recognition of these most gratifying conditions and in conformity with the proclamation of the president of the United States, that I join with him in designating Thursday, the 28th day of November, 1912, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer throughout the state, and I earnestly recommend the observance of the day by a revival of the spiritual enthusiasm that marked the establishment of this annual custom in the trying hours of a young and struggling nation.

ADOLPH O. EBERHART,
Governor.

Good Times on the Range.

Two Harbors.—The ore season of 1912 is rapidly drawing to a close. The steel corporation mines will finish their shipments this week. Many of the independents are closing and, except a few late cargoes needed, the outlook is that all will be finished by Nov. 25. The season has been the most successful and the shipments the largest on record. Of labor troubles there were none, and about all stockpiles have been cleaned up, which means steady work for a maximum number on the ranges all winter to replenish the piles for next season's shipments. The lumber shipments this season have been the largest in years, and the cut of forest products this winter will be large.

Diehl Wins Second Office.

St. Cloud.—While the newspapers of this city, with the help of the county attorney and even the attorney general, were trying to decide who should be awarded the court commissionership of the county, J. I. Donahue and Earl Scott having received nine votes each, Carrey Diehl, clerk of the municipal court at Sauk Centre, was laughing in his sleeve for the returns of the canvassing board today showed he had received thirty-eight votes in Sauk Centre alone. The attorney general ruled that in the case of the tie a vacancy existed and the judge of the district court would have had to appoint the commissioner. No person had filed for the office and the names were written on the ballot.

Range Season Successful.

Two Harbors.—The really good ore season of 1912 is rapidly drawing to a close. The steel corporation mines will finish their shipments this week. Many of the independents are closing and, except a few late cargoes needed, the outlook is that all will be finished by Nov. 25. The season has been the most successful and the shipments the lagest on record. Of labor troubles there were none, and about all stockpiles have been cleaned up.

Beet Harvest at End.

Pipestone.—The sugar beet harvest in the country east of here has been finished and growers have been paid a total of over $20,000 for their crop. Seventy carloads of beets have been shipped from Sherburn to the plant at Chaska and there are still 250 carloads to be shipped out. Yesterday the beet farm workers were paid off and a special train carried a majority of them back to Nebraska.

Virginia Buys Power Plant.

Griggs, president of the Virginia Electric Power & Water company, has sent acceptance of the city's offer to buy the plant for a consideration of $493,000 and special allowances for recent improvements, which will amount to an additional $50,000. A special election will be held to vote bonds to pay for the plant. The deal to buy the light and water plant has been pending for months.

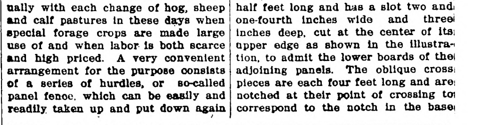
Craig Explains Plan.

Winona.—Rev. Dr. J. C. Craig, superintendent of Winona district Methodism, who recently established a country life commission for the district, to promote the religious and social life of the rural communities, went to Mankato in response to an invitation from Rev. G. A. Cahoon, superintendent of the Mankato district, and made an address before the district stewards' meeting there concerning the plan, which gives promise of wonderful success.

CONVENIENCE IN FENCING PASTURE LOTS OBTAINED IN ARRANGEMENT OF HURDLES

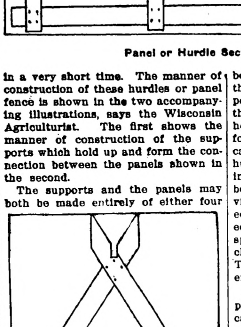
Farmers Will Find Panels Shown in Illustration Quite Satisfactory Where Frequent Changes Are Made in Feeding Roughage to All Farm Animals.

Farmers find it inconvenient to build and tear down fences continually with each change of hog, sheep and calf pastures in these days when special forage crops are made large use of and when labor is both scarce and high priced. A very convenient arrangement for the purpose consists of a series of hurdles, or so-called panel fence, which can be easily and readily taken up and put down again in a very short time. The manner of construction of these hurdles or panel fence is shown in the two accompanying illustrations, says the Wisconsin Agriculturist. The first shows the manner of construction of the supports which hold up and form the connection between the panels shown in the second.



Panel or Hurdle Section of Fence.

The supports and the panels may both be made entirely of either four or six inch material in width and one inch in thickness or material of both widths may be used in their construction to suit the economy and judgment of the farmer and builder. The base of each support is three and one-half feet long and has a slot two and one-fourth inches wide and three inches deep, cut at the center of its upper edge as shown in the illustration, to admit the lower boards of the adjoining panels. The oblique cross pieces are each four feet long and are notched at their point of crossing to correspond to the notch in the base board. The distance from the base of the lower notch to the base of the upper notch in the triangular support is three feet, which gives sufficient height to the fence to suit its purpose for fencing in either hogs, sheep or calves. In constructing the panels or hurdles this distance should be kept in mind when the upper and lower boards are nailed to the uprights. Obviously the distance from the lower edge of the lower board to the lower edge of the top board must correspond to it to give firmness and a close fit to the fence when it is set up. The length of the panels may be either 12 or 16 feet.



Cross Support.

If the hurdles and triangular supports of this style of panel fence are carefully constructed of good material and are carefully and properly stored away under suitable protection from the weather, they will give service for a long term of years and will not be found expensive. If, however, they are not properly made and cared for they will be found a very expensive form of fencing. For convenience in fencing off forage lots for the calves, hogs and sheep where frequent charges are made they have no superior.

PRACTICAL TESTS IN NEW FARMING

Missouri Station Making Co-Operative Experiments With Farmers of That State.

The Missouri experiment station is making co-operative experiments with the farmers in 105 of the 114 counties of the state. These co-operative experiments are conducted for the purpose of determining the best methods of soil tilage, varieties of farm crops, methods of fruit production, profitable dairy farms and the organization and administration of farm enterprises.

In 1911, there were 366 men in 105 counties co-operating with the central Experiment Station of Columbia in experiments to determine the best methods of farming. In carrying on this work, 3,000 packages of seed and more than 20,000 pounds of fertilizer were used.

These co-operative experiments have already demonstrated that alfalfa can be successfully grown in every county of the state.

The horticulture investigations in eight diffeernt districts have shown that by proper fertilization of orchards and timely spraying, the profits from orcharding in Missouri may be greatly increased.

The dairy farm co-operators on seven farms in southwest Missouri have, under the direction of the dairy department, increased their profits in some cases more than 20 per cent.

The assistance given to farmers by the department of farm management in the organization and administration have accomplished in some cases extraordinary results in increasing yields. Some of the owners of farms co-operating in this work have made the following statements in reference to the value of this work on their individual farms:

1. "The yield has been increased at least four fold; corn from 10 to 40 bushels per acre."
2. "The financial side of my farming has been helped from three to five hundred dollars."
3. "The financial side has been helped $1,000 this year."
4. "The returns from my farm this year have been at least $1,500 more than they were before."
5. "Farm management has been the cause of my remaining on the farm. It put my farm on a business basis restored confidence in my worn out farm, greatly increased the fertility of the farm. It has also lightened the labor of myself and family, encouraging us very much as we can see a bright future in store for us.

The Watering Trough.

Try putting a pinch of copperas in the watering trough once or twice a month. Better still, scrub out the trough and spray thoroughly with a copperas solution.

PROPER SYSTEM OF BOOKKEEPING

Value of Farmer Keeping Account of Farm Management Same as Business Man.

Farmers' Bulletin 511 of the Department of Agriculture contains some interesting facts and recommendations in connection with bookkeeping on the farm. "That there are over six million farms in the country which utilize land, labor, and capital as means of income making" gives the author, the opportunity to discuss the subject of the value of the farmer keeping an accurate and systematic account of his farm management the same as the business man or the railroad magnate.

This bulletin is not an attempt to outline a system of bookkeeping for the farmer. It is rather a discussion of the principles which are applicable to accounts on the farm. It is believed that any farmer who studies this bulletin sufficiently to grasp these principles will be able to devise a system suited to his particular needs.

Two important points must be considered in an attempt at farm bookkeeping. What does it cost to produce farm products? By selling at market prices, what profit is made on them?

"The problem of the farmer is to meet conditions on his own farm in a way which will give him the greatest net returns for his labor and the use of his capital. He should receive interest on his capital as well as wages for his labor, but owing to the lack of proper records few farmers know what wages they actually receive. There is reason to believe that the majority of farmers are really living on the interest of their investments rather than on the profits of their farms."

These suggestions are offered:

(1) Consider as one unit all that may be termed real estate, as land, farm buildings, fences, ditches, etc., whether the farm is rented or owned by the operator.

(2) Do not consider that the farmer or his family receive anything for their labor unless they are paid in cash the same as hired labor. If there is a surplus at the end of the year, it is their compensation. In this way the accounts will not be confused with items not strictly cash.

(3) Farm products used by the household should not be credited to the farm in the cash account along with the products sold, but should be taken care of separately."

Value of a Hoe.

So many people have a horror of using a hoe. It is the most comfortable implement to be found in the equipment of a gardener or farmer, and it is handy to use for so many purposes that one can not get along without it.

WILD LAND FARMS

What Bohemians Accomplished by Co-Operative Work.

Families From New Jersey and Ohio Make Homes in Tennessee Wilderness—Are Not Only Making a Living but Show Profit.

Nashville, Tenn.—In the spring of 1911 the Tennessee Central railroad located a colony of Bohemians on the Cumberland plateau at Mayland, under the name of the Bohemian Co-Operative Farming company. They purchased 5,300 acres in the woods without clearing, houses or fences. Immediately from New Jersey and Ohio Bohemian families came to the plateau and the work of transforming the wilderness into productive fields, gardens and orchards began. The story of this wonderful development is told by Rutledge Smith, industrial agent of the Tennessee Central railroad, as follows:

"The land was subdivided into fifty acre tracts, one tract to the family, so that the entire purchase would care for 100 families. Mr. Leonard Schwartz of New Jersey, an educated, cultured and trained farmer of large experience, was made manager of the colony, and the work of development has been under his immediate supervision. As the colony is co-operative in every respect, all the work is done by the Bohemians, no outside help being employed.

"The first work that was done after the property was subdivided was to build a few comfortable cottages to care for the pioneers. This done, they elaborated a careful program of procedure which would automatically expand with the increasing population.

"I went up last week to see the fruits of their labors. I found nearly 100 light haired and bronzed faced sons and daughters of Bohemia, intelligent, happy and content. Satisfaction reigned supreme with them, and they expressed themselves as having reached a clime as near perfection to their ideals of life as it was possible to find. It made me feel good to receive the sincere gratitude of these sturdy people for bringing them to the plateau of Tennessee.

"Mr. Schwartz showed me over the lands. Where formerly the timbered jungle stood were modern, imposing barns overflowing with feed. The fields of timothy had cut nearly two tons per acre, and these had been turned and planted in turnips and cabbage for cow feed, and it looked as though they would produce enough to feed the mountain.

"Then there were patches of buckwheat, rye and the vegetable gardens, all luxuriant and profitable. Vegetables have been canned for winter use and to sell.

"Not only have these thrifty sons of Bohemia supported themselves while making their homes, but are now reaping a distinct profit. They all have money, pay for what they buy, are good citizens and a blessing to Tennessee.

"Every day is workday for them. It is never too hot or cold; they keep everlastingly at it. They work with intelligence, with a definite idea in view and accomplish what they start out to do. They do not practice the habit of our farmers in going to bed at dark and rising before day. After supper they read and lay out the work for the morrow, discuss together the best means for advancement, spend an occasional evening in social enjoyment, and at a reasonable hour in the morning are in the fields and there they remain until dark. Success can only crown the efforts of such intelligent labor.

"In the field the Bohemian rides, no walking between the plow handles for him. There is no dragging the plows around at the head of the land, but the horses keep on moving. Everything that a horse or machine can do the Bohemian makes them do.

"They are now turning their attention to horticulture and orchards are being laid out on a scientific scale and thoroughly prepared. Also dairying is coming in for its proper share.

"Just as rapidly as they can build cottages, without taking the proper time from the fields, families from New Jersey are ready to fill them, and it will not be long until their full hundred families are enjoying the peace and plenty of those who by intelligent effort are transforming the plateau into the south's garden spot."

CLUES TO CRIMES

Trifles Have Served to Convict Perpetrators of Murders.

Slough Slayer in England Trapped by Brown Paper—Doctor Crippen Might Have Escaped Except for His Bloody Pajamas.

London.—The recent death of Sir Alfred Wills, for many years a high court judge, recalls his association with one of the best known and quite the most enthralling of legal textbooks: "Wills on Circumstantial Evidence."

Since the previous edition many notable cases have occurred to enrich the "romance of the forum," among which may be mentioned the Newcastle murder, the Slough murder, Crippen's case and some more recent, though the case of Oscar Slater recently rediscussed—has escaped the attention of the late judge.

The veriest trifle sufficed to put the noose around the neck of Broome, the Slough murderer. On being arrested on suspicion, he sought to discount it by telling the police that they would find $100 in gold in his room, which he solemnly declared he had brought away from his father's house.

The money was found, but the trouble was to connect it with Mrs. Wilson, murdered some time before at Slough. However, a smart officer had noted just an ordinary piece of brown paper in the victim's sitting room. This he carefully preserved, and on closely examining it it was discovered that "it had marks exactly such as would have been made by sovereigns made up into a rouleau, in which they lay not at right angles to paper, but somewhat sloping. No other coins would occupy the same space."

There were also marks of two small milled-edged coins—sixpence or half sovereigns— and minute yellow specks, such as it was found by experiment gold coin would leave after friction with brown paper. The sum found in the prisoner's possession being nineteen sovereigns and two halves, the chain of evidence was thus completed against him through the agency of a small piece of brown paper.

A view of a northern castle in a third class compartment enabled an artist witness to identify the carriage in which Dickman, the Newcastle train murderer, and Nisbet, his victim, embarked on their fatal journey. The accident that Dickman fumbled in his left trousers pocket to find his excess fare at Morpeth enabled the prosecution to connect the man so observed fumbling by the ticket inspector with the owner of a certain pair of "inexpressibles" stained with blood on the lining of the left pocket.

It is still fresh in the public mind how the most convincing evidence against Crippen was supplied by those fatal pajamas, the jacket of which was found with the body of Belle Elmore and was proved to belong to a suit of which the trousers were among Crippen's effects, sold by a Holloway firm on January 5, 1909, thus fixing the date of the interment as long subsequent to Crippen's arrival as tenant of the house, and negativing the suggestion that some previous occupier might have done the deed of darkness and concealed the traces in the cellar at Hilldrop Crescent.

An insignificant laundry mark, "599," showed the body found on Yarmouth beach in 1900 to be that of a young woman who had lived at Bexley Heath, and a cheap beach photograph served to identify a necklace found in Bennett's possession with one worn by the dead wife, whom he had throttled with a bootlace.

A dentist's recognition of false teeth and fillings in the almost calcined skull which had once held the fine brain of Doctor Parkman, led to the conviction of his colleague, Professor Webster, whose great knowledge of chemistry had enabled him otherwise totally to destroy his victim. A dentist also helped to hang Mannings in like manner.

RIDES 100 YARDS ON ENGINE

Driver of a Louisville Autobus Has a Remarkable Escape From Death.

Louisville, Ky.—William Lackey, driver of an autobus, had a remarkable escape here when he fell on the pilot of a freight engine which had struck his autobus and knocked him several feet into the air. The engine ran more than a hundred yards with the man on the pilot before the engineer was able to bring it to a halt. Lackey was not seriously injured. The autobus was demolished.

CRUSADE ON BIRDS' BEHALF

Radical Measure to Be Introduced in the English Parliament—Protection of Feathered Tribe.

London.—A new crusade against the killing of birds in order to supply feathers for millinery is in progress here, and a bill is soon to be introduced in parliament which, if it becomes law, will prevent many of the cruelest of the practices which result from the demand for feathers.

Lady Brooke, Ranee of Sarawak, presided at a lecture in support of the plumage bill for the protection of wild birds, at the Whitehall rooms. She said she thought that women had a tremendous part to play in advising the making of laws against the wearing of feathers. It was entirely women's part to do this, because it was for women that the birds were killed, and women wore the feathers.

James Buckland lectured on "The Value of Wild Bird Life to the Empire." He said that the feathers used in millinery were the "wedding garments of the birds." To be of any value in millinery the feathers must be taken before the birds attempted to rear their young. The prohibition to export plumage from India and Australia had been rendered abortive by the illicit trade in feathers, and Great Britain was the receiver of the stolen goods. If the truth could be told about the Calcutta custom house in relation to certain persons in London the public conscience would be shocked by the extent of the smuggling of feathers. With the passing of the plumage bill this trade would be stopped at once.

George Greenwood, M. P., proposed and Captain Tailby seconded a resolution strongly appealing to the government to grant facilities for placing the plumage bill on the statute book. The resolution was carried.

CROW SEIZED A GOLF BALL

North Berwick Woman Player Reports an Inquisitive Bird With Sporting Tastes.

London.—A golf story which is received with a certain amount of skepticism comes from North Berwick.

It is that Mrs. Barrett, an American resident there, while playing on the course, had her game interfered with by a persistently inquisitive crow. She had just made a tee shot when the crow took the ball, and, after flying with it for some distance, dropped it. Mrs. Barrett made two other shots, but the crow twice returned and lifted the ball after she had played it.

BUNCH OF GOOD ONES

SOME OF THE BEST OF THE APPROVED RECIPES.

Not All New Ideas, but All Are Worth Remembering—One Especially That Will Suit Those Fond of Peppermints.

Squash Fritters—One pint of cooked squash, one pint of milk, three eggs, and a little salt. Sufficient flour to make them turn easily on the griddle.

Custard Sauce—Beat one egg and another yolk slightly, add three tablespoons sugar, and a few grains of salt, then stir constantly while adding gradually one and one-half cups hot milk. Cook in a double boiler, continue stirring until mixture thickens and a coating is formed on spoon. Strain, flavor with vanilla, one-half teaspoonful.

Fried Chicken—Cut the chicken into six or eight pieces and season well with salt and pepper. Dip in beaten eggs and then in fine bread crumbs in which there is a teaspoonful of chopped parsley to every small cup of crumbs. Dip again in eggs and crumbs and fry in deep boiling fat. Cover the center of a cold dish with a nice white sauce.

Peppermints—If you want a good recipe for peppermints here it is: Two cups of sugar, one-half cup of milk, boil ten minutes, then add two teaspoonfuls of peppermint and beat till white and creamy and drop on buttered paper; be sure and get it thick enough. Keep a basin of hot water near so if it gets too stiff you can melt it a little.

Escalloped Salmon—Remove the bones and pieces of skin from a can of salmon and break the fish into small pieces. Put alternate layers of fish and bread crumbs into a buttered baking dish, having top layer of crumbs. Dot top with pieces of butter and pour in milk until it can be seen around edges. Bake about half an hour

Endive Salad—Use the endive plant as you would lettuce. It is considered better than lettuce, being more bleached and very tender. I like it best served by itself as a salad, dressed with French dressing, made as follows: Two tablespoons vinegar and four tablespoons olive oil mixed well, add one pinch of salt and a little red pepper. Pour over chilled endive plant and serve.

Delicious Stew.

I use a small agate kettle and set it inside of my large boiler. Keep plenty of water in the large boiler and keep it boiling hard. One pound of stew beef, two pounds pork chops, two onions. Put in a layer of pork, then a layer of beef and a little onion, season each layer with salt and pepper. Continue until all the meat is used. Do not put any water on the meat, but cover as closely as possible and set in the large boiler of boiling water. Put a cover on the large boiler, too. Do not uncover the small boiler for three and one-half hours, then you will find lots of gravy on the meat.—Exchange.

Hints on Cooking Eggs.

Use a vessel with straight sides (a quart measure will do), because it is easier to keep water up to the desired temperature than in a vessel with flaring sides. Have the water boiling hot. Drop the eggs in and keep the temperature up to boiling, but do not let it boil. Let eggs remain in the water eight or ten minutes; the whites should be jelly-like, not hard, and the yolk should also be cooked but not hard. Cooked in this way, eggs are more palatable.—Home Department, National Magazine.

Hamburger Steak.

Cook one heaping cup of macaroni in boiling salted water 20 minutes; while it is cooking fry two large onions and have your hamburger ready. Then butter a baking dish and put in a layer of macaroni, hamburger, onions and one cup of tomatoes (hot); repeat and cook about half an hour in hot oven. Salt and pepper to taste. You can reheat and make a good, hearty dish.

Coffee Mold.

Scald one pint of milk, dissolve two heaping tablespoons cornstarch (I prefer flour) in a little cold milk or water, add two tablespoons sugar, pinch of salt, half a cup strong fresh coffee. Stir this into the scalded milk and cook until it thickens. Turn into a mold and set it aside to cool. Serve with cream and sugar. It is called coffee mold.

Sausages Cooked in Batter.

Four tablespoons of flour, one pint of milk, one egg. Beat the batter five minutes, pour boiling water over one pound of sausage and pull off the skins. Place in baking dish, pour the batter over them and bake till nice and brown on top.

Brownies.

Cup cream, one-third cup of butter and one-third cup of powdered sugar. Add one-third cup of molasses, one egg, seven-eighths of a cup of flour one cup chopped peacan nuts. Bake in eclair tins with one-half nut on top of each cake.

Coffee Marshmallow Jelly.

Make plain coffee jelly, not too stiff, and when it has set serve in stemmed glasses, with melted marshmallow poured over it. Decorate with a whole marshmallow and serve.

CONSTRUCTION OF SUBSTANTIAL POULTRY HOUSES IN EXTREMELY COLD CLIMATES

No Matter What Design Is Used South Side Should Not Be Less Than Seven Feet High With Windows Extending to Top—Accommodates 50 Birds.

Poultry housing in the west is a subject that has caused a lot of discission among poultrymen and farmers. It is argued by some that owing to our winters, the cost of building suitable houses would be so great that the profits of the poultryman would be eaten up before he got started. After having had six winters' experience in Alberta, we are using eighteen houses of the type illustrated in this article, that have been constructed somewhat cheaper than the houses we used in Ontario. The house illustrated is 12x20 feet, giving accommodation for 50 birds.

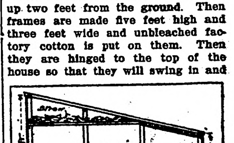
Perspective View of Cold Weather House. A. Burlap screen broken to show interior. In warm weather it is rolled up—in zero weather it is dropped. B. Perch. C. Dropping board. D. Nest boxes.

Some may try to dispute this and claim that not more than 40 birds should be kept in it, as that is the rule in the east, but owing to our dry atmosphere we can keep them in closer quarters as the main protection is required in the night.

We build the houses four feet high on the northside and seven feet high on the south side. No matter what design of house is built, the south side should not be less than seven feet high, with the windows extending right to the top. Starting at the bottom of the house (remember there is no board floor) there should be sufficient earth brought in in the fall of the year to raise the ground inside about six inches higher than the ground outside. That will give good drainage so that the earth will remain loose and dry all winter. It also provides a dust bath for the fowls and does away with the box in the corner. Six or eight inches of threshed straw should be placed on the ground inside the house in the winter, so that the birds can be kept busy in the cold weather. The dropping board is built 20 inches above the ground, and should be 18 inches wide for each perch. The perches should be 2x4 scantling, on edge, or a good, strong pole, and should be suspended from the roof and not touch the side of the house, as it is much easier to isolate the fowls from the vermin than to keep the vermin out of the house. The top of the perches should not be more than eight inches above the dropping board. Then a platform made of 1x2 inch stuff, set say four inches apart, should be built 20 inches above the top of the perches and should extend out even with the front of the dropping board. Straw should be packed on this platform up to the roof. Then make a curtain of coarse burlap or old grain sacks, which, when attached to the front of the platform will drop down two inches below the dropping board. If this curtain is let down at night during cold weather the fowls will be enclosed in a comfortable roosting box. The straw over the roosting place not only aids in keeping it warm, but it absorbs the moisture created by the animal heat that the fowls give off coming in contact with the cold air and prevent it spreading to the walls of the house and forming that heavy coating of white frost so commonly seen in poultry houses when the weather is cold.

The front of the house is boarded up two feet from the ground. Then frames are made five feet high and three feet wide and unbleached factory cotton is put on them. Then they are hinged to the top of the house so that they will swing in and when open can be fastened to the roof and out of the way. Poultry netting is put on the outside so that the fowls cannot get out when the windows are open. These windows should not be opened when the thermometer is below zero, as they will not become coated with frost and will let in more light than glass, besides giving a circulation of fresh air at all times.



Side Elevation of Roost.

By actual test, the house so equipped with cotton front frames is found to be considerably warmer than the same style of house fitted with glass windows.

HEN HOUSE MUST HAVE GOOD CARE

Simple Form of Whitewash, Thinned to Desired Consistency, Is Commonly Used.

Most of those who whitewash the fowl houses regularly use the simplest form of whitewash, made by slaking common lime in boiling water and thinning to the desired consistency. If to be used as a spray the wash is strained. A spoonful of crude carbolic acid, added to each pailful, increases the disinfecting properties, but lime alone is very cleansing, and many dislike the somewhat persistent odor of the carbolic acid. There is another form of wash liked better by some, on account of its more gluey characteristics, as ordinary whitewash rubs off rather easily. For this, one-half bushel of lime, one peck of salt, three pounds of ground rice, half a pound of Spanish whiting and one pound of clear glue are the rightly proportioned ingredients. Slake the lime in boiling water, keeping it just covered with the water. Strain it and add the salt, the rice, which has been boiled with water to a thin paste, the whiting and the glue, previously dissolved in warm water. Mix carefully and let the mixture stand three or four days. When ready to use the wash reheat it and apply while hot.

Food for Poultry.

We must furnish our hens with grain, green stuff and meat. Moreover, the quantity must be about right of each. If they are not given enough they will have to use it all for body-building and heat-production, and will have nothing left over to make eggs with. If we feed too much of some kinds the surplus will go to fat and the hens will get too lazy to lay.

PREPARING CULL BIRDS FOR MARKET

Should Be Fattened as Soon as Fowls Reach Proper Size—No Easy Task

How to fatten the culls for market is a question that is worrying every poultryman that has some for sale at this time. It is a problem of no little concern.

It is not hard to put fat on fowls, but to put fat on at a profit is what is the problem. To do this we must keep in mind that the sooner we market them the greater the profit.

As soon as the culls have reached a proper size they should be fattened. Place them in a pen to themselves and feed them foods that contain a large per cent. of carbohydrates, such as corn or its milling products. During the process of fattening do not give them any green food at all.

It usually takes about twenty days to properly prepare a fowl for the market. With ducks it only takes ten days. As soon as they are plump either kill them or ship them to your commission man or else send them alive.

Distant Fields.

Upon many farms there are fields distant from half a mile to a mile or more from the stock buildings. Such fields are great consumers of time unless judgment is used in selecting crops and time of labor. It is unwise to grow crops on distant fields which require frequent trips in taking care of them. Often the most satisfactory disposal is to seed down the piece and keep it in permanent mowing, hauling manure for top-dressing in fall and winter, when teams and men can best be spared for the purpose.

Our First Thanksgiving

THANKSGIVING day as it is now celebrated is a composite of the ancient Harvest festival, whose origins go back to the dim pre-historic beginnings of civilization, and of the solemn Puritan religious ceremony of thanksgiving. The joyous celebration of the gathering of the year's harvest, a day or week of feasting, song, dance and revel, is found in all ages and among all peoples. Thanksgiving days are also common to all religions, past and present, but they were not regular or periodical events—occurring generally after some victory of war. "The Puritans and the Pilgrims brought with them from England both the Harvest festival and the Thanksgiving days, the latter being observed whenever the deeply religious mind of the Puritan saw in their prosperity or good fortune the direct intervention of Providence. The Puritan also stripped the ancient Harvest festival of much of its rude license that had grown up around the celebration in England, and gradually through the two centuries following the setlement of New England, there grew up the practice of combining the two events and making the Thanksgiving annual. The religious element has been greatly subordinated as the years passed until at the present time it is to a majority of Americans only an incident that by many is observed only in the breach.

To the stern old Puritan of almost three centuries ago, the Thanksgiving day of 1912 would seem little less than sacrilege so far as the thinksgiving feature of it is concerned. But he would understand and appreciate the day's feasting and revel as a part of the celebration of the Harvest festival. The difference is apparent in the records of the early settlement of America. The first thanksgiving service held in North America was observed with religious ceremonies conducted by an English minister in the year 1578 on the shores of Newfoundland. This clergyman, accompanied the expedition under Frobisher, who settled the first English colony in America. The records of this significant day have been preserved in the quaint rules and regulations of the expedition as follows:

"In primus: To banish swearing, dice and card playing, and filthy communication, and to serve God twice a day with the ordinary service of the Church of England. On Monday morning, May 27, 1578, aboard the Ayde, we received all, the communication by the minister of Gravesend, prepared as good Christians toward God, and resolute men for all fortunes; . . . and Maister Wolfall made unto us a goodlye sermon, exhorting all especially to be thankful to God for His strange and marvelous deliverance in those dangerous places."

The second record of a thanksgiving service in America is that of the Popham colony which settled at Sagadahoc on the Maine coast in 1607. It consisted of prayer and sermon as in the first instance. These were thanksgiving days pure and simple, and after the settlement of Plymouth many others of a similarly solemn religious nature occurred.

The first Harvest festival held in America was upon December 13, 1621. It has been called, wrongly, the first autumnal thanksgiving held in America, but it was in reality the observance of the Harvest festival, with which the settlers had been acquainted in England. It was not a day set apart for religious worship and it is not likely that any religious service was held; on the contrary, it was the beginning of a whole week of festivity in celebration of the successful garnering of their first harvest in their new home. Qaintly does "Mourt's Relation" chronicle the event:

"Our harvest being gotten in, our Governour sent foure men on fowling, that so we might after a more speciall manner rejoyce together, after we had gathered the fruit of our labours; they foure in one day killed as much fowle, as with a little helpe beside, served the Company almost a weeke, at which time amongst other Recreations, we exercised our Armes, many of the Indians coming amongst us, and amongst the rest their greatest King Massasoyt, with some ninetie men, whom for three dayes we entertained and feasted, and they went out and killed Deere, which they brought to the plantation and bestowed upon the Captaine, and others. And although it be not alwayes so plentiful, as it was at this time with us, yet by the goodnesse of God, we are so farre from want, that we often wish you partakers of our plentie."

While the bill of fare of this first American celebration of the Harvest festival has not been preserved the feast was no doubt a royal one even if some of the food and the methods of preparation would seem strange and outlandish to present day Americans. The provisions must have been bountiful for there were about 140 persons including the 90 of Massasoit's company who were entertained for three days, and all had their share of supplies. From other sources we know that the foods of the sea were abundant and that the Pilgrims had made the acquaintance of the oyster. Ducks they had in plenty of the choicest species and also geese. Game, from grouse to venison, was brought in from the forest in abundance, and there was a "great store" of wild turkeys. Barley loaf and cakes of corn meal were highly prized by the colonists and played their part in the feast. For vegetables the Pilgrims had much the same as they had in England, Gov. Bradford's list naming beans, pease, parsnips, carrots, turnips, onions, melons, cucumbers, radishes. "skirets," beets, coleworts, and cabbages, in addition to wheat, rye, barley and oats. Besides these they had the indigeous squash and pumpkin, and it may be taken for granted that a careful Pilgrim housewife had preserved during the summer by drying a quantity of strawberries, gooseberries and "raspis." Take it altogether, the food basis of the first Harvest Thanksgiving day celebration in America was much the same as today.

But if the good housewife of today was obliged to prepare the thanksgiving feast with the utensils and inconveniences of the kitchen of three centures ago she probably would throw up her hands in hopeless despair. The kitchen with its great glowing fireplace was the housewife's domain and the general living room of the entire family. The walls and the floor were bare and the furniture meager and comfortless, while the kitchen furnishings were odd and strange. It was in this great cavernous chimney that the Pilgrim wife cooked her thanksgiving dinner. Placed high up in the yawning chimney was the heavy backbar, or lug-hole, of green wood, afterwards displaced by the great iron crane. It was beyond reach of the flames, and from it hung a motley collection of hooks of various lengths and weights. They had many different names, such as pot-hooks, pot-hangles, pot-claws, pot-cleps, trammels, crooks, hakes, gallow-balke, words that would puzzle a housewife of today to define. From these were suspended the pots and kettles in which the food was cooked. At both sides of the fireplace were large ovens in which baking and roasting were done.

There were no tin utensils in those old days and brass kettles were worth $15 a piece. The utensils were mostly of iron, wood, pewter or lattern ware. Glassware was practically unknown and bottles were made of leather. Wood played a great part in kitchen and tableware. Wooden trenchers from which two ate were used on the table for a century after the settlement at Plymouth. Wood was also used for pans and bread troughs and a host of other things displaced by tin in the modern kitchen. Of wood were made butter paddles, salt cellars, noggins, keelers, rundlets, and many kinds of drinking bowls which were known under the names of mazers, whiskins, piggins, tankards and kannes, words many of which have disappeared from use.

The dining table of these old days was the old Anglo-Saxon board placed on trestles, and the tablecloth was known as the "board cloth." Thus we have the origin of the time-worn phrase: "Gather around the festive board." And the furnishings of the "board" were simple, inventories of that period mentioning only cups, chafing dishes, chargers, threnchers, salt cellars, knives and spoons. The table fork was an innovation not yet in general use; the fingers of the eater were used to thrust the food into the mouth. The spoons were of wood and pewter mostly. Silver spoons were rare. There was no chinaware on the tables of the early thanksgiving feasts; for no chinaware came over on the Mayflower. That and the lack of glassware and silver would make a thanksgiving table of the seventeenth century look impossible to a housewife of today. Complete the picture by imagining large trenchers, square blocks of wood hollowed out by hand, placed around the "board" from each of which two people dig their food out with their fingers, and you have an idea of the manner in which our ancestors celebrated Thanksgiving three centuries ago.

But if the kitchen and table furniture would appear strange to a housewife of today some of the dishes served would appear even stranger. How many housekeepers of today can cook "suppawn" and "samp" from corn meal? Or bake manchet, simmels, cracknels, jannacks, cocket bread, cheat loaves or "wasel" bread? The colonists did not take kindly at first to the pumpkin, which in the pie form has become a distinctive feature of the modern thanksgiving feast. They called them "pomions" then, and this is awe-inspiring recipe from which the colonial housewife made "pompion" pie:

"Take a half pound of Pumpion and slice it, a handful of Tyme, a little Rosemary, Parsley and sweet Marjoram slipped off the stalks, then the cinnamon, nutmeg and pepper, and six cloves, and beat them. Then mix them and beat them together and put in as much sugar as you see fit; then fry them like a froiz. After it is fried let it stand until it be cold. Take sliced apples, thinne rounde ways, and lay a row of the froize and a layer of apples with currents betwixt the layer while your pie is fitted, and put in a good deal of sueet butter before you close it. When the pie is baked take six yolks of eggs, some white wine or Vergis and make a caudle of this, but not too thick. Cut up the lid and put it in. Stir them well together whilst the eggs and the pompions be not perceived and serve it up."

Thus saith the old cook book, and the modern housewife who faithfully follows this recipe can have at least a unique concoction, fearfully and wonderfully made, to grace her Thanksgiving table.

THANKSGIVING

By AMELIA E. BARR.

"Have you cut the wheat in the blowing field.
The barley, the oats, and the rye,
The golden corn and the pearly rice?
For the winter days are nigh."
"We have reaped them all from shore to shore,
And the grain is safe on the threshing floor."

"Have you gathered the berries from the vine,
And the fruit from the orchard trees?
The dew and the scent from the roses and thyme,
In the hive of the honey bees?"
"The peach and the plum and the apple are ours,
And the honeycomb from the scented flowers."

"The wealth of the snowy cotton field
And the gift of the sugar cane,
The savory herb and the nourishing root—
There has nothing been given in vain."
"We have gathered the harvest from shore to shore,
And the measure is full and brimming o'er."

Then lift up the head with a song!
And lift up the hand with a gift!
To the ancient Giver of all
The spirit in gratitude lift!
For the joy and the promise of spring,
For the hay and the clover sweet,
The barley, the rye, and the oats,
The rice and the corn and the wheat,
The cotton and sugar and fruit,
The flowers and the fine honeycomb,
The country, so fair and so free,
The blessings and glory of home.

It takes faith to enable a man to enjoy a meal in a cheap restaurant.

Some men never get a gait on them until they see a bill collector coming.

No, Alonzo, you can't always bring a girl to time by carrying her picture in your watch case.

The first time a small boy gets into a fight and licks his opponent he loses all interest in little girls.

It is far easier for a man to hide his light under a pint cup than it is for a woman to hide her jealousy under a bushel.

JUST THOUGHTS

Some men mistake a golden opportunity for a gold brick.

No bride can see herself as her husband's mother sees her.

It doesn't pay to do favors for a man who has a poor memory.

A ball team can't win in a walk; it must have at least one run.

The meaner a woman grows the harder it is for her to get a becoming hat.

It is nearly always a bitter disappointment to a girl when she turns a young man down, and he doesn't take to drink.

THE GENTLE CYNIC.

Woman is a creature of mood; generally the imperative mood.

If it's the unexpected that happens, why should it be unexpected?

If love is really a disease, it is the most contagious one on record.

The sins that pay no dividends are the ones that shocks the world.

Some people never enjoy good health, even when they have it.

The further a man can see the less is he apt to be sure he is right.

A man's idea of an ideal wife is one who believes everything he tells her.

Music hath charms, but it isn't the songbirds that make the best potpies.

When a girl throws a fellow over he realizes that youth must have its fling.

We never realize how much it costs to visit friends till they return the visit.

Almost as many people have been spoiled by too much money as by too little.

Every man has his price, and it is generally about twice as much as he is worth.

CONSIDER THESE POINTS.

Far better the naked truth than an overdressed lie.

Two's company—unless they are husband and wife.

The harder a woman is to please the less a man will try.

Self-control is the one thing a man always has until he needs it.

Some men find it easier to make a good living than to make good.

No matter how fast a young man may be he can be overtaken by trouble.

When it comes to making a rapid change of opinion every woman is an expert.

He is a very particular man who insists on combing his own hair in a barber shop.

Some people waste a lot of time trying to devise cures for other people's bad habits.

Lots of penitentiary cells are occupied by men who believed in reform for revenue only.

A woman would like to have a good figure in order to show her contempt for those who haven't.

Nothing shocks a girl quite so much as hearing an elderly woman laugh over the love disappointment she had when young.

JUST MUSING.

When a farmer decides to take a vacation he buys an excursion ticket and goes to a new country to look at the land.

In every town there are men who, in the matter of being saved, give the traveling evangelist the preference over the local preacher.

An unmarried man can go down town when he gets ready. But a married man must wait until his wife picks the ravelings off his clothes.

A widower with a houseful of children can get married any time. But a widow with a houseful of children should open her boarding house without unnecessary delay.

When a marriage takes place the qualifications of the husband with reference to his ability to make his wife comfortable and give her a place in society are a good deal discussed. But the qualifications of the wife with reference to making a home pleasant and happy are seldom mentioned. Nobody seems to consider that of any importance. -Jay E. House in Cleveland Leader.

HOW GIRLS MAY AVOID PERIODIC PAINS

The Experience of Two Girls Here Related For The Benefit of Others.

Rochester, N. Y.—"I have a daughter 13 years old who has always been very healthy until recently when she complained of dizziness and cramps every month, so bad that I would have to keep her home from school and put her to bed to get relief.

"After giving her only two bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound she is now enjoying the best of health. I cannot praise your Compound too highly. I want every good mother to read what your medicine has done for my child."—Mrs. RICHARD N. DUNHAM, 311 Exchange St., Rochester, N.Y.

Stoutsville, Ohio.—"I suffered from headaches, backache and was very irregular. A friend advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and before I had taken the whole of two bottles I found relief. I am only sixteen years old, but I have better health than for two or three years. I cannot express my thanks for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has done for me. I had taken other medicines but did not find relief."—Miss CORA B. FOSNAUGH, Stoutsville, Ohio, R.F.D., No. 1.

Hundreds of such letters from mothers expressing their gratitude for what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has accomplished for their daughters have been received by the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Company, Lynn, Mass.

SCOFFERS

Often Make the Staunchest Converts.

The man who scoffs at an idea or doctrine which he does not fully understand has at least the courage to show where he stands.

The gospel of Health has many converts who formerly laughed at the idea that coffee and tea, for example, ever hurt anyone. Upon looking into the matter seriously, often at the suggestion of a friend, such persons have found that Postum and a friend's advice have been their salvation.

"My sister was employed in an eastern city where she had to do calculating," writes an Okla. girl. "She suffered with headache until she was almost unfitted for duty.

"Her landlady persuaded her to quit coffee and use Postum and in a few days she was entirely free from headache." (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.) "She told her employer about it, and on trying it, he had the same experience.

"My father and I have both suffered much from nervous headache since I can remember, but we scoffed at the idea advanced by my sister, that coffee was the cause of our trouble.

"However, we finally quit coffee and began using Postum. Father has had but one headache now in four years, due to a severe cold, and I have lost my headaches and sour stomach, which I am now convinced came from coffee.

"A cup of good, hot Postum is satisfying to me when I do not care to eat a meal. Circumstances caused me to locate in a new country and I feared I would not be able to get my favorite drink, Postum, but I was relieved to find that a full supply is kept here with a heavy demand for it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

SCIENCE and INVENTION

FOR WRAPPING SMALL COINS

Paper Tube Closed at Bottom and Folding Flaps at Top Intended to Aid Bank Clerks.

A little device which will save bank clerks a great deal of time is the coin package invented by a New York man. With this the clerk will simply drop, say $5 worth of dimes, into the receptacle and close the top. There will be no rolling the coins up in a flat piece of paper and closing both ends. The device here shown consists of a paper tube closed at one end with the open end slightly enlarged and having two projecting wings. The requisite number of coins is dropped into the tube, it is given a sharp tap on the desk to settle them all evenly and the wings are bent inward and the top turned down to close the package. The wings and top flap can be gummed if desired, but this is not necessary.

NEW AID FOR PHOTOGRAPHER

Trouble of Getting Right Exposure of Plate Eliminated by English Manufacturer.

To the amateur photographer the great bugaboo in his work is arriving at the proper exposure of the plate. With most of the snapshot cameras now in use this is impossible, as they are adjusted for an average exposure; but the trouble is experienced when he comes to the point of making time exposures. This trouble has been met by an English manufacturing firm by the addition of certain chemicals to the sensitive emulsion of the plate or film which makes over-exposure impossible. This is particularly valuable in inside work, where the brilliantly illuminated portion of the room near the window calls for a short exposure and the darker parts for much more, and in this case it is impossible to expose for the shadow parts without overdoing the lighter portions. An exposure of forty times that of normal is permissible, and the plates developed in the ordinary manner; but where, for any reason, the exposure has been greater than that, a special developer is recommended.

DATES REVOLVE ON HANDLE

Calendar Pen, Intended Especially for Forgetful Business Man, Recently Put on Market.

An ingenious device, and one that will be useful to the forgetful business man, is the calendar pen, invented by an Illinois man. If the user wants to know the date of the month, all he has to do is to consult the handle of the pen and find it there. The handle has a barrel revolving on it and a calendar in the barrel. Of course, it must be set each day, but that can be done by the office boy, whose memory in some matters, notably the batting average of the big leagues, is marvelous. The dates of the thirty-one days are mounted on a series of rings on the handle of the pen and the barrel has openings trough which the right date can be seen when the calendar is set. By means of a locking device there is no possibility of the barrel turning to show the wrong figures.

NOVEL USE FOR BLUE LIGHT

Remarkable Demonstration by Doctor Titus Showing That It Produces Complete Local Anesthesia.

One of the most remarkable actions of light has recently come to our attention, the Journal of Surgery remarks. In an address before the Boston Physio-Therapeutic society, Dr. E. C. Titus has demonstrated that blue light possesses remarkable anesthetic power.

In his experiments he used a series of slender glass rods about one-eighth of an inch in thickness, placed side by side and tied together so as to form a kind of flexible mat which will adapt itself to various parts of the body. The glass must be of cobalt blue and transmit no red rays, this being a very important point. The rods are to be placed upon the area to be anesthetized, and some form of white light, preferably a tungsten lamp, brought as closely as possible without causing discomfort.

Strange to relate, in twenty minutes the part becomes insensitive, so that superficial and even deep incisions or punctures are no longer felt. This anesthesia lasts for one-half hour or more, and has occurred so constantly that there is no reason to believe that it is the result of suggestion or accident. Minor surgical operations have been performed under this method and without the least pain or discomfort, and there seems to be enough in it to merit attention.

More than thirty years ago there prevailed what was afterward termed the blue glass craze. All sorts of ailments were thought to be amenable to the action of blue light, and the newspapers were filled with glowing accounts of cures. Enthusiasm ran riot for a time and then the matter dropped out of sight.

Some time later there was a revival of interest in phototherapy when Finsen demonstrated the curative properties of the ultra-violet ray in various affections, especially lupus. Since then the physiological action of light has been carefully investigated, and, although much remains to be learned, there can be no doubt that we are nearer to an appreciation of its possibilities in the treatment of disease.

HANDY DEVICE FOR WATCHES

Metallic Support Fastened to Leather Sack Makes Stand for Timepiece While on Table.

In the accompanying drawings is shown a combined watch protector and support. The former is of leather and leaves the dial visible, being of a type already familiar. The metallic support attached to it, however, is something new, says the Popular Mechanics. It pivots around the two points which fasten it to the leather sack, and can be so set to constitute a support when the watch is placed upon a table or other flat surface. When not in use, the support lies closely around the watch case.

SIR CECIL SPRING-RICE

Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, the newly appointed British ambassador to the United States, is well known in Washington, where he was secretary of the embassy several years ago. He is at present British minister to Sweden. He is a graduate of Eton and Oxford, and began his public work as clerk in the British war office. He has been stationed in Teheran, St. Petersburg, Cairo, Tokyo, Berlin and Constantinople. He married in 1904 Florence Lascelles, daughter of Rt. Hon. Sir Frank Lascelles.

CANAL DONE WITHIN A YEAR

SUCH IS THE DEDUCTION FROM THE ANNUAL REPORT.

Lock Gates Are Yet to Be Completed —All Material Is Ready.

Washington, Nov. 18. — That the Panama canal will be completed within the next twelve months is clearly indicated by Col. George W. Goethals in his annual report to the secretary of war, which was made public here today.

While the chief engineer of the biggest job on earth does not say in so many words that his labors will be through in a year, he contrasts the work that was done during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, with what work remains to be done, and the reasonable deduction is that by this time next year the gigantic task will be at an end and vessels will be threading their way back and forth between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans through the world's greatest artificial waterway.

The most important work that is yet to be done is the completion of the lock gates. All the steel and other material that is necessary to make these gates is now in the shops in the canal zone and the work is going forward rapidly.

The report gives a detailed account of everything that has been done in the zone during the fiscal year which in any way affects the canal commission or the government. This commission has not only had the actual work of constructing the canal to look after, but its members have had to act as diplomatic agents for the government in treating with the authorities of the republic of Panama, a task which at times has required the most delicate tact.

Ex-Governor Dies.

Clemont, Ia., Nov. 18.—Former Governor William Larrabee of this state died at his home near here at 10:35 o'clock Saturday. For fifty years he had been prominently before the people of this state and has had much to do in moulding and fashioning the affairs of this commonwealth. For eighteen years he served as senator and his splendid ability was recognized as most of that period he was chairman of the ways and means committee.

Girl Scoffs At Colonel.

Milwaukee, Nov. 18. — Miss Ethel Silber, who was accidentally shot by Henry Wolf, has a wound in her breast almost identical with that received by Col. Roosevelt. After a physician had removed the bullet she said. "And they made such an awful fuss over a little thing like this. I am surprised that a big man like Col. Roosevelt would let them." Miss Silber was shot because she and Wolfe "did not think the gun was loaded."

Commission Form Rejected.

Boone, Iowa, Nov. 18.—By a vote of 406 to 836 Boone defeated the proposition to adopt the commission form of government.

Clark and Bryan Don't Speak.

Washington, Nov. 18. — William J. Bryan and Champ Clark no longer speak as they pass by, although before the Baltimore convention they were cronies. Men close to Speaker Clark says he holds the Nebraskan responsible for his defeat for the presidential nomination and that he will have nothing to do with him personally or politically in the future.

There are possibilities of party trouble in the feud. Leader Underwood fell out with Mr. Bryan a few years ago.

ROYALTY WELCOMES THE AMERICAN SETTLER

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS, THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT, WELCOMES AMERICANS TO CANADA.

It was a happy speech, that on that beautiful October day, the Duke of Connaught, Governor-General of Canada, made at Macleod, Alberta. It was an opportune speech, heartful and resonant with good fellowship. And, as it was specially intended for American ears, the audience, comprised largely of so many American settlers in Canada, the time and place could not have been better chosen.

It was in reply to an address of welcome tendered to him at the pretty city of Macleod, with the foothills of the Rockies as a setting, and the great wheat fields between, and in fact all around the place as the foreground, that His Highness, true to the best interests of the country and to those of the Americans who choose to make Canada their home, said in part:

"I am well aware that among those whom I am now addressing, there are a very great proportion who were not born under the British flag. Most of these will have realized by now that residence under that flag implies no disabilities. All we ask is that the laws of Canada should be obeyed.

"With this provision every one is free to come and go, to marry, to live and to die as seems best to him, and as it pleases Providence.

"We bring no pressure to bear on anyone to adopt the Canadian nationality, for we do not value citizenship which is obtained under compulsion.

"Our American cousins are welcome from over the border. Thrice we welcome our Canadian and British brothers, who return to the Union Jack, after living under the Stars and Stripes.

"History is repeating itself. For many years hundreds of young Britishers have sought fortune in the western States. Time has brought about a change, and the tide has set in the other direction, bringing across the frontier numbers of our neighbors to whom we are glad to return hospitalities.

"One of the chief dispensers of such hospitality in proportion to its population has, as we have said, changed its character from an important cattle town to a thriving wheat producing area.

"What it has lost from the picturesque point of view, it has gained in the material side, and I wish, in conclusion, to express the hope that the prosperity which has evinced itself here for the past ten years, may continue unabated in the future."

There is no reason why at a hundred places on this educative, instructive and interesting trip of His Royal Highness he might not have expressed himself in the same terms, and on each occasion, addressed large gatherings of Americans who are now settled on the prairies of Western Canada.—Advertisement.

Her Name Was Not Polly Ticks.

During the late campaign an Illinois candidate for the legislature was driving through the country, seeking votes among the farmers, when he met a young man in farmer's garb, walking by the roadside.

Having in mind a prospective vote, he stopped his horse, and saluting him in a familiar manner, inquired:

"Are you paying any attention to politics nowadays?"

The young man stopped, looked at him suspiciously, and drawled out:

"No, stranger; that don't happen to be my gal's name; but ef it was, I wouldn't think it was any of your durned business."

This ended the interview as well as the prospect.

COMPARATIVE TABLES.

The following tables show the tabulated vote, state and national, with tables of the vote four years ago for comparative references. Of course, the exact figures are not obtainable from official sources as yet, it requiring weeks for the authentic compilation. In only one or two instances are the governorship contests in doubt. In these states the matter will probably have to be decided by the supreme court, since the margins are so close as to warrant contests. The tables follow:

FINAL RESULT OF IMPURE BLOOD

The System Is Left Weak, Run Down and Helpless Against the Attacks of Disease.

If you need strength, if your blood is thin, your digestion disordered, it will pay you to investigate the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, the remedy that has transformed so many weak, anæmic, dyspeptic, ambitionless people into strong, healthy, hungry men and women.

Mrs. Lena May Roberts, whose address is R. F. D. No. 3, Aberdeen, So. Dakota after several months of suffering finally found the right tonic in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says:

"For months after the birth of my baby, I suffered terribly from a general breakdown in health. I was in bed for three months and after that was able to be up only part of the time. I was sick all over, being pale, weak and thin. My appetite was gone and my head ached most of the time. Oftentimes there seemed to be a rush of blood to my head and I would faint away. I was very nervous and was not strong enough to do any work.

"As the treatment I was taking did not help me, I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which a friend said had helped her. After taking a few boxes, I began to get well rapidly. I continued using them for a time and am now as well and strong as ever in my life."

The value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in general debility lies in their direct response to the needs of the blood. Their work is to make new blood. That they do this well is shown by the gradual disappearance of the symptoms and the return of color and health. They lay the foundation for permanent health in the future.

For the same reason these pills have cured anæmia, after-effects of the grip and fevers, rheumatism, indigestion, and nervousness, dizziness, neuralgia and St. Vitus' dance, and are recommended wherever a tonic for the blood and nerves is needed.

A valuable booklet, "Diseases of the Blood," containing fuller information about rheumatism and other diseases of the blood will be sent free upon request.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all druggists, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50, by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y. Adv.

We have noticed that the men who die for women nearly always do so at the hands of an injured husband.

Calumet Ends "Bad Luck."

Remember when you were a youngster, what a trial baking day was? If Mother was lucky, everything went finely—but if she had "bad luck" her cakes and her pies and her bread were failures. Her success in baking seemed to depend almost altogether on "luck."

Nowadays there's no such thing as "baking luck." At least, not in the kitchens of the up-to-date cooks. Simply because Calumet Baking Powder has smashed that old time idea. It has made baking sure of success. It has made inexperienced cooks able to bake perfectly, and day after day it is saving hundreds of dollars' worth of time and materials by doing away with costly failures.

Calumet Baking Powder is the purest baking powder made—and guaranteed not only to BE pure, but to stay pure in the CAN and in the BAKING. Calumet has twice been officially judged the BEST baking powder made—receiving the highest awards at the World's Pure Food Expositions in Chicago (1907) and in Paris (1912). Adv.

CHAS. W. LATTA
Editor and Publisher.

Published every Friday at Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota.

Entered as second-class matter Sept. 22, 1911, at the post office at Holt, Minnesota, under the act of March 3, 1879.

Congress meets in regular session within a few days and it will be fun to see if President Taft will persist in vetoing legislation enacted for the public good.

We are getting tired of reading all the newspaper talk as to what President Wilson and Congress ought to do. They ought to do the very best they know how, with an honest intent to do right for the people at large. They should do no moro and no less.

We believe the old system of working out road tax is nothing but a joke, and any township with any pretensions of intelligent citizenship should discard it. All such taxes should be paid in money and the road work done under the contract system, with no pay allowed the contractor until his work is properly done.

President-elect Wilson has announced his intention of calling an extra session of congress in April for the purpose of again passing tariff legislation along the lines of the bills passed by the last congress and vetoed by President Taft. That this should be done on behalf of the common beople is entirely right but the extra session will perform only half of its plain duty if it fails to repeal the Canadian Reciprocity bill.

The two most important of the proposed constitutional amendments were passed at the recent election in this state. They are the 5 per cent railroad gross earnings tax, and the one mill tax for roads and bridges. To northern Minnesota in particular the one mill tax means a lot, as bad roads are easily the main factor iu retarding its development. Here's hoping that within the next few years we will see roads oll over the state of the kind we ought to have.

The next meeting of the Northern Minnesota Development Association will be held at Crookston on December 5 and 6. This organization is doing great work for Northern Minnesota, and we hope to see this town, and every other town that claims any patriotism or progressiveness, represented at that meeting. Proposed new legislation will be one of the main items for consideration and every citizen of this section of the country should help boost for such legislation.

Judge Holm Extends Thanks

Again have my friends given me a majority, this time of 1140 without practically any campaigning being done by me. This is the biggest majority that I have ever received and therefore I wish to extend to all my friends who so generally supported me at the last election my sincere and hearty thanks.

Yours very truly
—P. H. Holm.

NEED IS FOR SPECIALIZATION

Work of Years Has Shown That Education of Children Cannot Be Standardized.

If the children came into the world standarized like the parts of an automobile, the educating of them would be a much simpler matter than it is today. Likewise, it would be a deal less interesting.

Fortunately or unfortunately, children are not so standarized. One has a ten-candlepower intellect, so to speak, and one a three. Moreover, even those who have substantially the same brain power, require different treatment to get that brain power in action.

To vary the metaphor, one child has the entrance to the house of his mind on the front porch, where everyone can see and reach it. Another, with quite as large a house, may have the entering door hidden in some side angle, where the casual passerby will never see it.

The boy of 15 who drags in his class in fifth grade can grasp an electrical problem better than his father or his teachers. In that line, he is ahead of the average high school student. The house of his mind has its door in an electrical recess.

The world did well to insist on education. The world will do better when that education is more individualized, mere fitted to each special case.

REALLY NOT WORTH HAVING

Average Person Will Think Suitors Were Foolish to Quarrel About This Woman.

She was a beauty of a somewhat cow-like type—phlegmatic and indifferent—and she had lived in a little suburban town all her life. Her circle of admirers had dwindled down to two suitors—one in a distant city, who did his courting by letter, and the other on the spot—and she couldn't make up her mind which she would have.

"You don't know what a bother it is, Cousin Mary," she remarked to a relative who was trying to sound her on the subject, "this deciding between James and John. They're both of 'em good enough fellows. Some people want me to have James—he's the one out west. He's right well off an' could give me a good home; but I guess I kinder favor John the most. Pa likes him, too. Pa don't care for James; but then John ain't got much money. Well, I don't know what I'll do. Maybe it would be easier to have John, he lives right next door, an' I wouldn't have to go travelin' 'way out west after I was married. But then James is so well off! Say, Cousin Mary, s'posin' you jest decide for me. I'll take whichever one you say!"

NOT ALL GUARDSMEN.

It is not infrequently said that a British Guardsman, or "Guardee," as an officer of the household troops is familiarly called, enjoys an advantage over his poorer neighbors in the rest of the army. If he has, he does not take advantage of it. The majority of well-known generals never served an hour in the elite corpse of the army. Lord Roberts was an artilleryman; Lord Kitchener an engineer; Lord Wolsey, the late Sir William Butler, Sir Redvers Buller, and Sir George White were infantrymen; Sir John French, Sir Robert Baden-Powell were in the cavalry, and Sir Evelyn Wood has been in both cavalry and infantry. Lord Methuen is the best known of those who were promoted from the Foot Guards.

"Yes, and I know the belle who can wring it."

SEEK THE GARDEN OF EDEN

Many Have Joined in That Unsatisfied Quest Since First the World Was Young.

The location of the Garden of Eden has been determined so many times with such absolute and authoritative finality, albeit each time in a different place, that not all the critics will take seriously the announcement of Sir William Willcocks, the English engineer who has been for several years in the employ of the Turkish government engaged in irrigation and reclamation work in Mesopotamie. Sir William is of the old-fashioned school that firmly believes Eden was a definite region, and his work in the valleys of the Euphrates and the Tigris convinces him that the historical and biblical Eden was below the junction of these two rivers, and not far above this point, as many scholars and archaeologists have believed.

He has recently set forth his view in great detail before the Royal Geographical society, and is in no wise disconcerted by the comment that he makes the site of Eden identical with the region of the Arabian Nights. Sir William believes, moreover, that the ancient Eden was the same engineering methods as are now being employed there again after the lapse of ages, and he is so enthusiastic that he urges England to bargain Egypt for Babylonia.

In the meantime the land for Eden will go on—a never-ending search in which every human heart seeks the earthly paradise by methods and pathways all its own.

GET REFORM THROUGH SHAME

New York Friends of Animals Have Really Novel Scheme Which Has Worked Well.

At noontime the energetic member of the S. P. C. A. set out with a bundle of grain bags with which he replaced the stuffy antiquated bags tied to the necks of several horses which were trying in vain to get a bite to eat. On each bag the letters "S. P. C. A." were printed in red.

"These things are not much of an advertisement for your society," said a bystander. "They are not much better than the bags you took off."

"They're good enough," said the society's representative. "They will answer the purpose all right. By tomorrow or the day after the owners of these horses will have grain bags of the latest pattern. This is the surest way to make them invest. We may rant around and threaten arrest, but they pay no attention. We dare not confiscate their bags without providing others. It is the appearance of these others that works the reform. Any man who has enterprise enough to own a horse has too much pride to advertise the fact that his grain bag has been provided by the S. P. C. A. so he hustles around and buys a new one."—New York Press.

SCIENTISTS GET SPECIMENS.

With a sugar barrel full of snakes, lizards and unusual specimens of fish, a large collection of birds, about 10,000 insects and spiders and the carcasses of three large bears and two cubs, Prof. C. R. Crosby of the department of entomology at Cornell university, and Dr. H. A. Wright, members of the Cornell expedition into the Okefenokee swamp have returned to Ithaca. Prof. Crosby, four other local scientists, E. L. Worshman, state entomologist of Georgia, and his assistants enter the swamp about June 1 for exploration and study. The snakes, lizards and fish taken were hardened in formaline and packed in a barrel. The birds and game brought back will be mounted. The trip taken by the party was the first of its kind in the interests of the state entomological department.

Hoag Approves Drainage Law Amendments

W. R. Hoag, engineer in charge of the Mud Lake drainage work, was here Tuesday night and the editor of this paper had the privilege of a long conversation with him, the topics discussed being mostly the conditions in the Mud Lake district and the unfairness of the drainage laws.

Recently we published some articles calling attention to conditions in the Mud Lake drainage work which the settlers object to. Concerning this matter, Mr. Hoag says that he believes he has not the power to dictate to the contractor as to where work should be done at any particular time, but that his duty is to furnish the contractor with specifications promptly when required, and to see to it that the work is done right before it is paid for. In this respect he claims that his duty is fully and fairly performed.

Regarding the drainage laws, we called Mr. Hoag's attention to the amendments suggested by the Commercial Club of Holt, to provide for a public hearing before granting any extensions, and for the collection and distribution of penalties. He expressed his approval of these suggested amendments as being proper to safeguard the rights of the taxpayers. He also pointed out that the present law provides for the engineer modifying ditch plans and changing the route, if he deems any change necessary or beneficial, but, in the event of such changes being made, ther is no provision for adjusting the benefits and damages, which is manifestly wrong. It has been necessary to make numerous changes in the Mud Lake work, and it is to be hoped that the laws may speedily be changed so as to render justice to all the settlers.

Died From Exposure While Intoxicated

Carsten Gronwald died about noon Wednesday as the result of lying out overnight while intoxicated. He had been at Middle River Tuesday and started for his home in East Valley late in the evening having a good supply of liquor inside and outside. Next morning John Udstrand found him lying in the road, and, supposing he was simply drunk, dragged him to shelter and thought he would sleep it off. About noon he died. The coronor was notified and made an investsgation yesterday. He decided that no inquest was necessary, as it seemed clear that the unfortunate man had died from exposure while under the influence of liquor.

Gronwald was generally known as hard drinker, and we understand that his wife had begun divorce proceedings. He was about 45 years of age and is survived by his widow and five small children.

Pioneer Woman Passed Away

Mrs. Martha Nelson died at her home here last Saturday at 4 o'clock, of heart trouble. She was 68 years of age and is survived by one son Axel Nelson, the local blacksmith. She was a native of Sweden and has been a resident of this vicinity since the spring of 1887. For over a year she has ailing with the trouble that caused her death, but has been confined to her bed for about three months only. The funeral occurs this afternoon, Rev. M. B. Ordahl officiating, and the remains will be laid away in the Holt cemetery.

Martha Nelson, as she was familiarly called by all, was a woman of high charactor and her loss will long be felt in the community. She did her life duty well, and has earned her final rest and reward.

FOR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM

Try the Treatment That Cured This Pronounced Case in Minneapolis After Other Treatments Failed.

Sciatica is neuralgia of the sciatic nerve. Its origin is generally rheumatic and is the direct result of taking cold. For this reason the disease is commonly known as "sciatic rheumatism." That Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure this disease is shown by numerous cases like that of Mrs. J. B. Hansen, of No. 221 Twentieth Ave., So., Minneapolis, Minn. She says:

"A few years ago following an attack of the grip I was taken with sciatica. For six years I suffered untold agony and thought it would be a blessing to me if I could only die. There were sharp, shooting pains in both of my limbs and my shoulders and arms were affected also but not so severely. If I moved about quickly, the pain would catch me so that I had to scream. My limbs would swell until I could hardly walk. I also had a terrible dull pain in my back which was often unbearable. I was confined to bed for a week or two at a time. While suffering from the sciatica I was further run-down by weakness common to women of my age.

"I received so little relief from the doctor's medicine that I became discouraged and quit it. My husband urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as he had read how they had cured cases like mine. I felt better after I had taken the pills a short time but took several boxes until I was certain I was cured. I give this statement of my cure thinking that other sufferers may be helped as I was through using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."

The tonic treatment with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills succeeds where other treatments fail because it is based on the sound medical principle that the health of the nerves depends on pure, red blood.

Every person who is interested in the home treatment of nervous disorders should send for a new edition of our booklet entitled, "Diseases of the Nervous System, Their Nature, Symptoms and Treatment." Address the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Smelled a Grafter.

A Boston clubman recently returned from a visit to New York city. In discussing his trip one of his friends asked him whether he had a policeman in his pocket. The clubman hesitated for a moment, seriously questioning his friend's sanity, when the latter added:

"I didn't know whether you could be there a week without some grafter or other getting into your pocket."

R.R. OFFICIALS DIE WHEN AUTO UPSETS

HOWARD JAMES AND S. B. PLECHNER OF GREAT NORTHERN KILLED.

NEAR J. J. HILL HOME.

Victims Were at the Head of Road's Purchasing Department—Other Occupants Escape.

Minneapolis, Nov. 26. — Howard James, director of purchases of the Great Northern railroad, and Samuel B. Plechner, purchasing agent of the same road, were instantly killed when the automobile in which they were driving turned turtle and crushed them to death.

Mrs. Plechner, Miss Helen James and Miss Margaret Mann, who were riding in the same car with the two men, were uninjured. Mrs. Plechner lacerated her wrist after the accident while pulling Miss Mann from beneath the car.

The accident happened directly in front of James J. Hill's country home, "North Oaks." The bodies were taken to the Hill granary by employes and later brought into St. Paul.

Tried to Pass Another Car.

The accident was the result of an attempt on the part of Mr. James to drive ahead of another car, occupied by O. E. Nelson, 237 Maria avenue, St. Paul, and W. E. Alden of White Bear Lake, and their wives. Mr. James signalled with his horn that he would pass their car, and the Nelson automobile turned to the right to allow the James' car leeway.

The spot where the accident occurred is filled with sand. The front wheels refused to climb the grade of sand, toppled a second or so on two wheels and then slowly turned over. None of the party had time to jump. The projecting automobile top fortunately raised the tonneau a little off the ground, a feature which probably saved the lives of the women who were in the back seat.

Howard James was a nephew of the late Marshall Field, Chicago's merchant prince, and was left a bequest upon Mr. Field's death. His mother was Mrs. Lyman James of Williamsburg, Mass., a sister of Marshall Field.

Mr. James is survived by his daughter, Miss Helen James, his mother; a brother, Phillip James, Forest Lake, Ill., and a sister, Mrs. J. H. Gillette, Hudson, N. Y.

Many Survive Mr. Plechner.

Mr. Plechner is survived by a widow, his mother, Mrs. Benjamin H. Plechner, two brothers, L. H. Plechner of Seattle and F. I. Plechner, Spokane; three sisters, Mrs. Charles Fantle, Sioux Falls, S. D.; Mrs. L. R. Frankel, St. Paul, and Mrs. E. S. Friend, Milwaukee.

James J. Hill was downcast over the accident. He spoke feelingly of the death of the two men.

ESCAPES ASYLUM

Patrick Gibbons of St. Paul Eludes Guard, But Is Found in Haystack.

St. Peter, Minn., Nov. 26.—Eluding a guard in the hospital for the criminal insane, Patrick H. Gibbons, the St. Paul murderer, escaped from the prison. He was at liberty less than one hour, a prompt search resulting in his capture.

Gibbons was sent to the local institution for committing a double murder, slaying his wife and a priest, Father Walsh. At his trial evidence was introduced to show that he was insane when the crime was committed, and he was the first man to be sent to the criminal insane building under the new law.

During the two years of his confinement Gibbons has been a model prisoner. He is employed in the kitchen and was directed to accompany one of the guards to the main building. As they entered the hospital Gibbons darted out a side door and ran across an area completely eluding his pursuers. When the guard found that he was outdistanced he reported the escape to Superintendent R. M. Phelps and the latter impressed every available employe of the institution to make up a searching party. One of the men ascended a steep ravine in the rear of the hospital and found Gibbons had concealed himself in a hay stack.

Only the biggest person could hold a whole dose—one-half a dipperful, with half a dipperful of New Orleans molasses added to help slick it down and make it taste good, only it didn't taste good. In those historic days every old woman was a doctor and gathered her own "yarbs" in the woods, and knew how to mix up medical messes that would stir the vitals of a brass monkey or a cast iron pig. All backwoodsmen believed in "yarb" doctors. Something in "yarbs," at that.

A FRIEND'S ADVICE

Something Worth Listening To.

A young Nebr. man was advised by a friend to eat Grape-Nuts because he was all run down from a spell of fever. He tells the story:

"Last spring I had an attack of fever that left me in a very weak condition. I had to quit work; had no appetite, was nervous and discouraged.

"A friend advised me to eat Grape-Nuts, but I paid no attention to him and kept getting worse as time went by.

"I took many kinds of medicine but none of them seemed to help me. My system was completely run down, my blood got out of order from want of proper food, and several very large boils broke out on my neck. I was so weak I could hardly walk.

"One day mother ordered some Grape-Nuts and induced me to eat some. I felt better and that night rested fine. As I continued to use the food every day, I grew stronger steadily and now have regained my former good health. I would not be without Grape-Nuts, as I believe it is the most health-giving food in the world." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Thomas Martindale, the Philadelphia moose hunter, said, apropos of the opening of the deer season:

"Buck fever is a strange disease. The victim of it does some remarkable things.

"A Philadelphian was deer hunting in Maine. He shot four or five shots into a thick copse, and then he shouted:

"'All of you come out of there.'

"Half a dozen sportsmen issued from the copse hurriedly.

"'Are you all out?' said the Philadelphian: 'One, two, three, four. Where's Jake? Oh, there you are, Jake. Are you all out, sure?'

"'Yes,' they answered. 'We're all out; the whole party's out.'

"'Hurrah, then!' shouted the Philadelphian. 'Hurrah! I've shot a buck!'"

"LEAN YEAR" ADVICE.

Large Crops Are Pitfalls, Declares Hill at Congress.

Minneapolis.—Large crops have their disadvantages as well as their compensations, according to James J. Hill, empire builder.

Mr. Hill, speaking before the second Minnesota Conservation and Agricultural congress at the Armory, said that one of the great disadvantages of a big crop was that farmers lulled themselves into fancied security.

"People read returns from the harvest fields this fall and conclude that soil fertility cannot have been impaired where the yield per acre is so far above the acre average," said Mr. Hill. "Worse yet, the farmer himself, lulled into fancied security by the large crop of 1912, unconsciously assumes that this year's experience is likely to be repeated without any special effort on his part.

"The first business of real conservation is to lift agriculture to the rank of a science well understood and practically applied."

"The farmers of Minnesota need just such lessons as the Conservation congress is giving them," said Archbishop Ireland. "The fault of many is that they are not responding to suggestions. They are living as in the pioneer days, watching their trees and counting their cows.

"Home conditions should be improved that we may love our farms. The rust of the city is largely because of the lack of social culture."

After warning those present of the dangers of over-confidence because of a great crop one year, Mr. Hill said that agricultural problems should be studied to help when lean harvests were the rule. He said that farming was a falling occupation, that the percentage of urban life increases and that of rural life decreases.

"In 30 years the rural population has fallen 24 per cent in this country," continued Mr. Hill. "For forty years, including a period marked by the greatest advance in other industries, immense growth of railroad transportation, lowering of rates on farm commodities to our principal markets, and all the inducements that should bring men to the farm and increase its output, farm population receives only a small increase, the number of farms remains almost the same and the acre-yield of four principal crops shows a falling off in every case.

"Men are being wasted in the city who are needed in the country. The lives of those who are fixed by choice or necessity to the soil are to some extent wasted because consumed in unintelligent and ineffectual efforts. The soil is being unskilfully treated and is returning a diminishing product."

Characterizing the farmer of today as a business man in every sense of the word, Edmund D. Fisher, deputy comptroller of New York city, addressed the congress on banking reform and its interest to the agriculturist. He said that the farmer's business is progressing at such a rapid rate that broader credit relations must be developed between him and the banker. He urged a central banking system. "The fear of central control of the fear of the ignorant mind," he said. "Prosperity in this country means high money rates which in turn kill prosperity. The delegates to this congress have a duty to perform. They should pass strong resolutions in favor of the imperative need of banking reform and then see that their respective congressmen take prompt action."

CASHIER ASKS PARDON

H. J. Schwartz Says He Was Made Tool of Others at Royalton Institution.

St. Paul.—Before the State Board of Pardons the application of H. J. Schwartz, cashier of the State Bank of Royalton, who was convicted on the charge of having received deposits when he knew the bank was insolvent, will come up for another hearing. Schwartz has been in the reformatory at St. Cloud since February, 1912.

The banker asks for freedom on the grounds that he intentionally did no wrong; that he believed his bank would pay out; that he took no money from it for his own use, and that he was the victim of other officers of the institution. Five of the jurors who voted for his conviction have signed petitions for his pardon. Congressman C. A. Lindbergh, who has known Schwartz since childhood, has written a personal letter to the pardon board. Petitions with several hundred signatures, some of them from persons who lost money in the bank, are on file.

To Test Duluth Franchise.

Duluth.—With only two dissenting votes the city council decided to test the validity of the franchise under which the Duluth Street Railway company is operating, and voted an appropriation of $15,000 to carry the investigation to the supreme court of Minnesota. This money will be used in court expense and in paying the fees of the attorneys to assist City Attorney Carmichael, they being Frank B. Kellogg of St. Paul and Francis W. Sullivan of this city.

NO INDICTMENTS

Investigation of Sales of North Dakota Publication Not Brought Before Winona Grand Jury.

Winona.—Although the postal inspectors who worked up the case which brought about the indictment of the publishers of Jim Jam Jems, a monthly publication, on twenty-six counts at Fargo, N. D., were in Winona when the grand jury in the federal court convened in the November term, it is understood the case received no further consideration here.

The indication that no consideration was given the case here is strengthened by the fact that the jury was in session only two and one-half hours before submitting a sealed report and adjourning. It is said several matters of minor moment had received consideration.

Those connected with the Jim Jam Jems case admit that they have been investigating the connection of the newsdealers with the publishers, but say this is establishing a link in strengthening the case against the publishers arrested November 9. However, it is rumored, if the publishers are convicted in the trial next April, the government may proceed against the newsdealers.

No. 2, state hail insurance: Yes, 145,173; no, 60,429.

$72,000 to Be Disbursed During Week at Fond du Lac.

Cloquet. — G. W. Cross, superintendent of Fond du Lac Indian reservation, will disburse $72,000 of government money during the week beginning Dec. 2 being annual payment. Each Indian, to the smallest child, will receive $75 per capita. Last year they each received $10. The increase is in the nature of an experiment, hoping to prove that the Indian is capable of spending wisely the increased sum, and if it is successful the amount given this year, or more, will become the permanent annuity.

The first payment will be at Cloquet, Dec. 2 and 3. Payments are to be made the following days at Sawyer, Brookston, Fond du Lac, Duluth, Superior and Solon Springs.

The government road from Cloquet to the Indian village north of the city has been completed and is an excellent highway. The road was begun last spring and Supt. Cross says that it is likely that next year the government will continue the road to Brevator.

HOLD UP CITIZENS

Three Masked Men Keep Saloon Crowd Lined Up Against Wall for an Hour.

Glencoe.—Three very bold masked and armed holdup men boldly entered the saloon of Osnek & Jumer, commanded everyone in the place to hand over all his valuables, and for nearly an hour kept their victims lined up against the wall while they robbed everyone who came into the place. Several citizens, among whom were Dr. J. H. Dorsey, Ed Churchill, a clerk, and H. L. Simms, president of the First National bank, entered the building, thinking some joke was being played.

After the robbers had secured about $500 they went outside, hid the money and valuables and entered the saloon of Henry Pulrabak, where they were arrested by the sheriff and marshal. They evidently thought their disguises had precluded and possibility of their being detected.

Old Mill Burns.

Minneapolis. — One of the oldest sawmills in the city, formerly known as the Acme mill, owned by the Itasca Lumber company, was completely destroyed by fire, entailing a loss of roughly estimated at $10,000, $6,000 of which is covered by insurance. The old mill, according to F. C. Gerhard, treasurer and general manager of the company, has sawed more lumber than any other mill in the United tSates, the amount being more than 2,000,000,000 feet.

SENATOR A. O. BACON

50 KILLED; PICTURE SHOW FIRE

OPERATOR LOSES HIS HEAD AND CRIES "FIRE."

Women and Children Trampled to Death—Many Others Are Injured.

Balbao, Spain, Nov. 26.—A terrible panic was caused by the cry of fire in a moving picture show here. About 50 children and others were killed. Only one woman up to a late hour had been found among the dead. The number of injured is not known as most of them were taken home by friends.

The scene of the accident was at a large circus, which had been converted into a continuous cinematograph show. As the price of admission was only two cents the building was crowded to its utmost capacity, for the most part with women and children. The operator of the machine lost his nerve when a film ignited and screamed "fire!" He was able to extinguish the flames without difficulty, but the effect of his cry upon the audience was instantaneous.

Almost everyone within the building sprang up. Police and attendants were powerless to control the panic-stricken people and were swept away by the surging mass which sought to fight a way to the exit. Scores were knocked down and trampled and many were crushed to death in the passages from the galleries and to the streets.

The manager and other employes have been arrested and are held pending an inquiry.

WANT DEATH IF GUILTY

Though Proclaiming Innonence, Alleged Murders Spurn Half-Way Sentence.

Salem, Mass., Nov. 26.—The fate of Joseph J. Ettor, Giovanitti and Caruso, who have been on trial here for the murder of Anna Lopizzo in the Lawrence textile strike since Oct. 14 will go to the jury at once.

When court adjourned on Saturday, after Ettor and Giovannitti had made impassioned pleas to the jurors on their own behalf and for Caruso, Judge Quinn announced that he would deliver his charge immediately. The case should be in the jury's hands by noon.

Though Ettor and Giovannitti pleaded absolute innocence, they asked, if adjudged guilty of the crime, that they be given the death penalty.

"No half-way punishment," was their insistent demand. The two strike leaders are accused as accessories to the murder before the fact. Caruso is charged as an actual participant in the riot and with stabbing Police Officer Oscar Benoit at the time the Lopizzo woman was shot.

Marries Twice in a Week.

Chicago, Nov. 26.—Mrs. Aimee Givins, "Kirkman" Boehm was married for a second time within a week in Crown Point, Ind., late Sunday night. This time Mrs. Boehm was married to Edward Boehm under his right name and not as "Edward B. Kirkman," Kirkman being the name of Boehm's former employer for whom he was chauffeur.

Flames Rout Insane Patients.

New York, Nov. 26.—Hundreds of insane and feeble-minded persons of both sexes in a group of institutions at Amityville, Long Island, were thrown into great excitement by a fire here. One male inmate was burned to death. Several hundred inmates were led out in confusion. Fire believed to have started from a defective light wire threatened 60 patients, 15 of whom were bed-ridden. An insane patient ran into the flames after a pet canary and was killed.

THE PRICE OF BEEF

IS HIGH AND SO IS THE PRICE OF CATTLE.

For years the Province of Alberta (Western Canada) was the Big Ranching Country. Many of these ranches today are immense grain fields and the cattle have given place to the cultivation of wheat, oats, barley and flax; the change has made many thousands of Americans, settled on these plains, wealthy, but it has increased the price of live stock.

There is splendid opportunity now to get a

of 160 acres (and another as a pre-emption) in the newer districts and produce either cattle or grain. The crops are always good, the climate is excellent, schools and churches are convenient, markets splendid, in either Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

The Cheerful Life

It is the right of everyone to live and enjoy the cheerful life. We owe it to ourselves and those who live with us to live the cheerful life. We cannot do so if ill health takes hold of us.

The wife, mother and daughter suffering from hot flashes, nervousness, headache, backache, dragging-down feeling, or any other weakness due to disorders or irregularities of the delicate female organs—is not only a burden to herself, but to her loved ones.

There is a remedy. Forty years experience has proven unmistakably that will restore health to weakened womankind. For 40 years it has survived prejudice, envy and malice. Sold by dealers in medicine in liquid or tablet form. "What shall we do with our ex-presidents" is again a leading question before the people. Leave 'em alone, to be sure; haven't we done enough for them already?

The city clerk of Norfolk, Neb., has survived thirteen serious surgical operations. We are not surprised; it is really pretty hard to kill off some of those Nebraska politicians.

President Taft has quietly informed his friends thas he must not be considered or spoken of as a candidate for the presidency in 1916. It is gratifying to learn that Mr. Taft has discovered a fact that everybody else was quite well aware of.

Mr. Carnegie seems to have made himself quite unpopular by offering to furnish pensions for our ex-presidents. If its popularity Mr. Carnegie is after, or even if he is merely trying to do some actual good with his surplus money, we suggest that he establish a fund for the financial assistance of country editors. The worst of them usually does more real good in a lifetime than Mr. Carnegie has accomplished in his.

Recent figures show that of the postmasters of fourth class offices 42,354 receive less than $500 annually as remuneration for their services. It is probably true that 25,000 receive less than $200 per year. And yet, the postmaster of the fourth class office is, in the majority of cases, required to be possessed of as much general competence as the postmaster drawing a salary of $5,000 per year. One of the main differences in the conditions is that the high salaried postmaster usually gets the plum as a reward for political activity, while the man in the fourth class office is not allowed to get busy along that line.

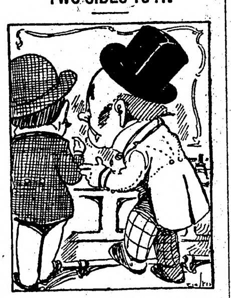
KINGFISHER A POWERFUL BIRD

Turtle's Shell More Than One-Eighth of an Inch Thick Was Pierced by the Beak.

"You'd be surprised to know how birds of prey hover over the hatchery grounds of the millions of young fish hatched there," said Jeremiah Berkhaus, superintendent of the Pennsylvania state hatchery. "There are half a dozen species of aerial pirates, but about the worst are kingfishers. I knew that the kingfishers could strike a fish a terrific blow with its beak, but I was really surprised to learn just how terrific the blow was. A few days ago I saw one of these birds resting in a 50-foot tree over one of the pools of the hatchery, but before I could get my gun to shoot it, it made a dive into the pond and a moment later arose with a large mud turtle. The bird slowly winged its way to the tree, but before it reached its resting place I shot it. It fell to the ground with the turtle. I examined the turtle and where the beak of the kingfisher had struck it, I found a small round hole which the point of its beak had broken through. Measuring the thickness of the turtle's shell I found that it was a little more than one-eighth of an inch and hard and bony. A kingfisher will eat twenty or thirty good-sized fish a day, so you can see they are very destructive. Blue heron, bittern and fish hawks are especially destructive to the young trout and young fish. I have shot many of these birds and am compelled to go around with a shotgun almost continually."

TWO SIDES TO IT.



Horan—Well, 'tis too bad that none av us kin iver be as good as some people think we sh'u'd be.

Doran—Aye, but 'tis consolin' to think that none av us kin ever be as bad as some people think we are.

Solving a Difficulty.

A painstaking mother of two children was attempting to give them a serious idea of her anxiety to make them good and to make plain to their minds the gravity of the task before her. Overcome with the impossibility of ever attaining her mother's ideal, three-year old Frances answered in all earnestness, "Don't try to make us good, mother; just shoot us."—Everybody's.

HOUSE FLY CHAMPION PEST

Costs the American People Many Millions to Sustain Him in His Position in Life.

A bulletin of the New York city board of health presents some rather stupendous estimates of the material cost to the community of the summer invasion of flies and mosquitoes. Taking alone the loss through typhoid, of which disease the fly is recognized conspicuously as a carrier, this is placed as an annual "decrease in the vital assets of the country" of more than $350,000,000.

There are other items in the schedule of a rather startling character. The sum of $10,000,000, it is figured, is paid annually for screens upon dwellings to keep out the flies. And yet enough of them get by the screens to work $350,000,000 damage!

Evidently we have begun at the wrong end to "swat the fly" effectively. And this fact has come to be widely recognized. It is prevention of breeding, rather than extinction of the race after the annual generation has been brought forth, to which attention is directed. If the fly is not born, there is no beginning to his pestilential career; he is non-existent. And the success which has attended measures taken for the suppression of the mosquito in neighborhoods hereabouts would seem to indicate the desirability of similar methods in the treatment of the house fly.

MAKING SECRET DRAWER.

A secret drawer for the deposit of money or valuables may be made as follows:

Bore a very small hole through the upright piece between the top drawers of a bureau and continue boring until the hole goes through the side of the drawer that is to be made secret. Whittle a wooden peg, and fit in the hole, neither too tight nor too loose, just so that it can be easily pushed through the hole with the little finger. The secret will not be easily discovered, because the opposite drawer will have to be pulled out altogether to push the peg in.

Cutting Herbs.

The active principle of all plants is strongest just when the flowering process is going on, but before seeds are actually formed, and this is, therefore, the best time for cutting and drying herbs.

He expects to receive his supplies as postmaster any day now, and will then be ready to give the people to the east some service that they have been very much in need of.

Paris Banker Conducts Extensive Financial Transactions From His Cell.

The Paris police recently raided a financial establishment in the [illegible] and confiscated the contents of the safe as well as the books, thereby putting a stop to the lucrative source of revenue of a banker named Zucco, who has been in prison for several months for irregular financial transactions.

M. Zucco, although ocupying a cell, first at the Sante and then at Fresnes, contrived to open another financial establishment in the same house as that occupied by his bank, which was closed by the police when he was arrested.

From his cell he directed a scheme for getting small investors to subscribe jointly for lottery bonds.

Business went well. The new establishment was soon employing ten clerks, and M. Zucco in his cell was making about $300 a day. But disappointed clients informed the police.—New York Tribune.

RIDDLE OF RADIUM.

Among scientists, says Popular Mechanics, it is very generally conceded that the discovery of radium gave to the world one of its most interesting and unique riddles. After all the "cranks," as well as geniuses, had failed to produce a perpetual motion machine; after all the alchemists and their scientific successors, the chemists, had failed to change any single chemical element into another, and the world had settled down to the belief in the impossibility of achieving either of these aims; the discovery of the phenomena of radioactivity seemed to show the fallacy of the conclusions in both cases.

MANY EVENTS ARE MENTIONED

Home and Foreign Intelligence Condensed Into Two and Four Line Paragraphs.

Washington.

Congress reconvenes for the short session Monday, Dec. 2.

The question of tariff is not scheduled for the short session of congress. The extra session will deal with the matter.

That there will be no effort to convert the progressives of the senate into a separate party organization was the opinion expressed by Senator Bristow of Kansas.

The state department received word that William M. Fink, an American citizen, superintendent of the San Toy Mining Co., whose camp is about fifteen miles from Chihuahua, is being held for $5,000 ransom by the Mexican rebel bands which captured Santa Eulalia.

Gideon C. Bantz, connected with the treasury department for forty years, resigned as assistant treasurer of the United States at the request of Secretary MacVeagh. He will be succeeded by Christian S. Pearce, chief of the division of banks, loans and postal savings.

In order that adequate facilities may be provided for the handling of parcels post business efficiently and on a country-wide scale at the outset, January 1, Postmaster General Hitchcock has asked every postmaster in the United States to obtain from the business public information as to the probable extent the new system will be used.

A new grandson, or, more correctly speaking, a "grandson-in-law" was the rather unique present received by the venerable Senator Shelby M. Cullom of Illinois on the occasion of his eighty-third birthday anniversary. The addition to Senator Cullom's family was brought about by the wedding of his granddaughter, Miss Eleanor Cullom Ridgely, daughter of William Barret Ridgely, former comptroller of the currency, and Dr. Henry P. Parker of this city.

Great Convenience.

"You find that an automobile helps you to keep your engagement?" "It does better than that," replied Mrs. Chuggins. "If you don't want to keep them, it enables you to explain everything by saying you broke down."

A New Experience.

"You can't blame the Balkan allies for feeling elated."

"No?"

Prefers Them Old.

A Wood street business man dropped in upon a Smithfield street business man.

"I see you don't object to hiring old men?"

"No," said the Smithfield street man. "Why should I?"

"Some employers seem to think that old men wouldn't do for business these days."

"Why not?"

"Pace too fast, I guess."

"Well, I don't know about that. When they get too old to be interested in canoes, or mandolins, or fancy waistcoats, or horse races, I find 'em pretty good for work."

"Never mind dat, sah, never mind dat! Dat grass will all grow out an' be as green as you is!"—Judge.

Concrete an Old Story.

Rome was not built in a day, nor built as fast as Tammanytown, nor built in structural steel, but it turns out that most of Rome's mighty structures, temples, circuses, baths, aqueducts, were built in concrete, not reinforced with iron and steel, as we build now, but a good quality of sand, stone and cement nevertheless. On this powerful central core of cement was fitted an ornamental facing of finest marble.

"No, ma'am," said Harry, "jest a reg'lar habit of sleepin' eight hours a day, ma'am."—Harper's Weekly.

PROTOCOL MAY BE FINAL ACT OF WAR

ALLIES RECOGNIZE THE FUTILITY OF BREAKING THE TCHATALJA LINES.

INDEMNITY ESTIMATED.

Turkey May Be Forced to Pay $240,000,000—Servians Deny War With Austria.

London, Dec. 3.—Telegraphing from Sofia, the Daily Mail's correspondent asserts that the allies will demand from Turkey as a war indemnity 48,000,000 pounds ($240,000,000). The correspondent at Constantinople of the same paper says:

Bulgarians Conciliatory.

"After the armistice is signed, an interval of a week will elapse, for the appointment of plenipotentiaries to negotiate peace. The Bulgarians have shown considerable conciliation in the last few days.

"They are beginning to realize that they are too exhausted ever to break the Tchatalja lines.

Dissension Among Allies.

"Also the allies are beginning to dispute among themselves, which is an additional reason for wishing to finish the war quickly."

The signature of the protocol of the armistice, which was expected Sunday was postponed until Tuesday, as the Greek delegate has not yet received the necessary authority from his government.

Garrisons Given Rations.

It is understood that the armistice will extend for about a fortnight if necessary and cover the whole field of operations. The difficulty with respect to the beleaguered garrisons of Adrianople and Scutari is being surmounted by permitting them to receive daily rations during the armistice.

The plenipotentiaries appear to have been concerned so far solely in arranging the armistice, but a peace conference is expected.

May Be Last Shot of War.

A strong feeling is entertained that the last shot in the war will have been fired when the armistice is signed.

There is little doubt that the peace negotiations will be difficult and protracted. The question of holding a European ambassadorial conference still is undecided, but the international situation is much more peaceful. The Servian government denies the reported preparations for a conflict with Austria, while the Austrian press is much less bellicose.

Montenegrin Crown Prince Wounded.

Paris.—Crown Prince Danielo of Montenegro, has been seriously wounded, according to a Rieka report to the Matin. He received his wounds in an assault on the Turkish position dominating Scutari. The prince was brought to Rieka in an ambulance, according to the reports, where an operation was performed for resection of the intestine which had been perforated.

CITY WATER PROJECT.

Snows of Mt. Chasta May Become the Supply of San Francisco—Cost Nominal.

Redding, Cal., Dec. 3.—The snows of Mt. Shasta, 300 miles from San Francisco as the crow flies, may become that citys' water supply as the result of the refusal of Secretary of the Interior Fisher to turn over the Hetch-Hetchey valley as a reservoir for the purpose.

Leon E. Hunt, assistant chief engineer of San Francisco, has arrived here and with nine other civil engineers went in automobiles to Baird, a town on the McCloud river, where all began surveying and measuring the flow of water.

The McCloud rises on the slope of Shasta, and after joining the Pitt river, flows into the Sacramento.

Advocates of the McCloud river project say that it could be put through for less than $20,000,000, the sum voted by Los Angeles for the construction of the Owens river aqueduct, which is intended to supply water to that city.

Dynamite Shatters Windows.

Prairie du Chien, Wis., Dec. 3.—The explosion of 700 pounds of dynamite in the warehouse at the Bridgeport stone quarry east of this city early Sunday woke up the people for 20 miles around and shattered many windows in the village of Bridgeport. A hole four feet deep and ten feet in diameter was blown in solid rock where it stood and the building was blown to bits. Fire in the woods is thought to have been responsible.

Race Suicide in U. S. Deplored.

Chicago, Dec. 3.—"Of 700 girl graduates of American universities, inquiry shows 90 per cent of them married and 85 per cent of these refused to have children. Unless something is done to check race suicide among native-born Americans, the United States will become a nation in which the Latin, Slav and negro races will predominate," was the prediction of Cosmo Hamilton, English novelist, playwright, essayist and editor of the London World, on a visit to the United States.

"After that he hit me in this year and then in the othtr one; and stomped on me while I was down. When I got up and began to run he followed, kicking me every yuther step.

"I never got so tired of a cullud man in all my life!"

THE RIGHT SOAP FOR BABY'S SKIN

In the care of baby's skin and hair, Cuticura Soap is the mother's favorite. Not only is it unrivaled in purity and refreshing fragrance, but its gentle emollient properties are usually sufficient to allay minor irritations, remove redness, roughness and chafing, soothe sensitive conditions, and promote skin and hair health generally. Assisted by Cuticura Ointment, it is most valuable in the treatment of eczemas, rashes and other itching, burning infantile eruptions. Cuticura Soap wears to a wafer, often outlasting several cakes of ordinary soap and making its use most economical.

Old Landmark Gone.

The Blaine schoolhouse in Mars Hill up on the hill, the one James G. Blaine honored years ago by giving a bell, which still hangs in the heltry, is no more. It has been converted into a storeroom and moved to an other site. A good many bright boys and girls, now old men and women, graduated from this historical building, and no doubt there is a feeling of sorrow as the old schoolhouse leaves the foundation it was builded upon years and years ago.—Kennebec (Me.) WILLIAM B. RAYNER

When United States Senator Isador Rayner of Maryland died the other day it was reported that his son, William B. Rayner, might be appointed to fill out his term, as was done in the case of Senator Elkins. But the exigencies of politics led to the appointment of William P. Jackson, Republican national committeeman.

THOUGHT HIMSELF INVISIBLE

CHICAGOAN SWINDLED BY CONJURER ROUGHLY HANDLED

Another, Also "Invisible," Hurt By Auto, Does Not Blame the Chauffeur.

Chicago, Dec. 3. — George A. Pupausky, a banker-conjurer, recently released from the house of correction where he was sent by Judge Landis to serve a six months' sentence for selling invisibility ointments and love charms, has been arrested again. Pupausky sold Anton Lokoritz, a fellow countryman, a black cat's ear to make him invisible. Lokoritz gladly paid $25 for the charm and put the ear, according to directions, in his left waist coat pocket.

Confident in his invisibility Lokoritz then entered a saloon with the proprietor of which he was not on friendly terms. He stepped behind the bar and began to help himself to bottled goods. The bartender immediately fell on Lokoritz and hustled him into the street.

"Why, you can't see me. How did you know I was there?" exclaimed Lokoritz in bewilderment.

"I saw you all right. Keep out of here," admonished the bartender.

Lokoritz went to Pupausky's house, thinking something must be amiss. He did not see the conjuror but was met by a woman who heard his complaint.

"The trouble is," she said, "that you should have had a magic bean. The cat's ear is no good without the bean."

Lokoritz bought a bean and returned to the saloon. No one noticed him and he thought this time he had the right magic. He went behind the bar again but was descried without difficulty by the bartender, who ejected Lokoritz more energetically than before so that he had several bruises to show the police when he made his complaint.

Another man bought a black cat's ear and was run over soon after by an automobile. The man did not make a complaint, his friends said, because he was invisible and could not blame the chauffeur for not seeing him.

COLD IN MIDDLE WEST.

Weather Man at Washington Also Forecasts Snow and Rain This Week.

Washington, Dec. 3.—Higher temperatures have overspread the eastern states, while considerably colder weather will advance eastweard over the Middle West and the eastern and southern states until Wednesday, according to the weather bureau.

A disturbance now off the north Pacific coast will move inland about Tuesday attended by rains in the Pacific states and rain and snow in the northwest. This disturbance will prevail over the Middle West Wednesday or Thursday and the eastern states near the end of the week. Rain in southern and snow and rain in northern districts east of the Rocky mountains and a general reaction to higher temperature, will precede and attend this disturbance."

Pirates Fielded Best.

New York, Dec. 3.—Pittsburg, which finished second in the National league race last season, led the league in fielding by the considerable margin of nine points, while the pennant-winning New York team was seventh. This is shown by the official fielding averages just made public, Pittsburg leading with a percentage of .972, as against .963 for Philadelphia, second in merit in this particular, while the New Yorks are next to last, with .956, two points ahead of the Bostons.

LOOK AFTER YOUR HEALTH

If Your System Is Kept Toned Up You Will Escape Many Diseases That Find Easy Victims Among Pale People.

Enough disease germs enter the average human body every day to cause death if the healthful organism did not combat these germs and render them harmless.

Let the human system become run down, or debilitated, and this power of resistance to disease is weakened. Soon the disease germs get the upper hand, an acute sickness follows or the patient becomes a chronic invalid.

It is in the blood that the battle to maintain the health is fought. Keep the blood toned up, the bowels open and observe ordinary care as regards food and rest and you will avoid much sickness.

Debility is not a recognized disease but is a condition in which the sufferer cannot get a good night's sleep, wakes up all tired out, has no strength or ambition, is nervous, has a poor appetite, has trouble with the stomach, and is subject to headaches and backaches. It is most commonly met with in people who have to work hard, are confined indoors, eat improper food or have worries and grief.

The case of Mrs. M. V. McCaslin, of No. 202 South 27th Street, Lincoln, Neb., shows the value of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as a tonic for all run-down conditions of health. She says:

"I gave Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People a trial for general debility from which I had been suffering about three years. I was thoroughly tired and worn out and had no ambition for anything. I became very weak and kept losing strength. My appetite was poor and I was nervous and had severe headaches.

"I needed a tonic treatment and tried several tonic remedies but none seemed to help me until I tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I was soon much improved in health and able to get around and do my work. I took the pills until cured and am pleased to recommend them to anyone who is run down in health."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are for sale by all druggists, or will be sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, 50 cents per box; six boxes for $2.50 by the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

End of a Noted Folly.

The monocle has long since been out of fashion in England, and is soon to disappear from Paris, which has been its last stronghold. It was invented by a Dutch dandy, and its evil effects upon the eye were at once noted by oculists. The monocle first appeared at the congress of Vienna in 1814, when it was worn by its inventor. One folly, at least, has had only about a century of life.

A DOCTOR'S SLEEP

Found He Had to Leave Off Coffee.

Many persons do not realize that a bad stomach will cause insomnia.

Coffee and tea drinking being such an ancient and respectable form of habit, few realize that the drug—caffeine—contained in coffee and tea, is one of the principal causes of dyspepsia and nervous troubles.

Without their usual portion of coffee or tea, the caffeine topers are nervous, irritable and fretful. That's the way with a whisky drinker. He has got to have his dram "to settle his nerves"—habit.

To leave off coffee or tea is an easy matter if you want to try it, because Postum gives a gentle but natural support to the nerves and does not contain any drug—nothing but food.

Physicians know this to be true, as one from Ga. writes:

"I have cured myself of a long-standing case of Nervous Dyspepsia by leaving off coffee and using Postum," says the doctor.

"I also enjoy refreshing sleep, to which I've been an utter stranger for 20 years.

"In treating dyspepsia in its various types, I find little trouble when I can induce patients to quit coffee and adopt Postum."

The Dr. is right and "there's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavour is always uniform. Sold by grocers—50-cup tin 30 cts., 100-cup tin 50 cts.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's name and 2-cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich.—Adv.

POWER COMPANY WINS.

Work on Dam Near Hoot Lake Expected to Begin in the Spring.

Fergus Falls.—The jury in the so-called Hoot lake cases brought in a verdict, after a trial lasting a full week, which is substantially a victory for the Otter Tail Power company, and removes the last obstacle to the construction of a big new power plant in this city, except possibly a final appeal to the supreme court.

The Otter Tail Power company, which already owns three dams here, proposed about two years ago to change the course of the river above this city, cutting out a ten-mile bend and bringing the stream to the brow of some hills overlooking the city, from whence the water could be shot down through a steel tube, making a straight fall of seventy feet, and trebling the power possibilities.

City Abandons Its Dam Site.

To do this the company was first compelled to induce the city to abandon the municipal dam site which is in the bend that is to be cut out. This was done after a hard-fought election, the company's proposition winning by a large majority. Since then the project has been delayed by farmers, who objected to the diversion of the river, or any part of it, from their farms. The company has conducted a long series of negotiations, and settled with the majority of the landowners, paying about $500 to each. Several landowners refused to settle, and the district court finally appointed commissioners to appraise the damages in these cases. Six of the landowners refused to accept the awards of the appraisers and appealed. All of the cases were set for trial during the present term, but four of them were settled, the power company agreeing to pay about double what the appraisers had awarded.

Two Cases Heard in Court.

Two of the cases, brought by Ernest Trochman and E. G. Brastad, came to trial. The commissioners had awarded these men $500 and $600, respectively, for the diversion of the stream from their farms. They sued for $3,000 and $5,000. A farmer jury was secured and an earnest appeal was made to it to see that the farmers were given what they were entitled to in their contest with a "gigantic corporation." The jury gave one of them $600 and the other $425.

An appeal may be taken to the supreme court on the ground that the company has no right to divert the stream and that the condemnation proceedings are illegal, in which case the owners could demand whatever they saw fit for the diversion. This is not considered a very serious possibility, however, and it is probable that work on the big power project will begin in the spring.

SCHOOL IS DEDICATED.

Mr. Eberhart and Other Prominent People Attend Ceremonies at Meadow Lands.

Duluth.—Governor Eberhart, Dean A. F. Woods of the Minnesota agricultural college, and C. G. Schultz, superintendent of public instruction, accompanied by a large number of experts in agricultural education, prominent clergymen, railroad officials and business men of northern Minnesota, journey to Meadow Lands and dedicated a consolidated rural school.

The presence of the large number of prominent men and women was tribute to a community that has been built but four years, and has already provided itself with a well equipped consolidated school.

Pipestone Almost Out of Debt.

Pipestone.—The burning of $9,000 worth of county bonds on the courthouse was a feature of the meeting of the commissioners here. The bonds were not due until 1921, but the board had the funds with which to take them up and they were accordingly paid and burned. There is remaining against the county an indebtedness of only $11,000 and the board has made provision to take up $6,000 of this the coming year. First steps have also been taken for making a handsome public park out of the two blocks on which the courthouse now stands.

Throws Self Between Cars.

Staples.—An unidentified man committed suicide in this city Wednesday by throwing himself between the cars of a moving train. His remains were scattered for rods over the right of way before the train could be stopped. The coroner could not find a scrap of writing on the body by which to identify it.

Eliminates Compulsory Retirement.

Winona.—At every departmental session of the Minnesota Educational association at St. Paul next week, advocates of the proposed state-wide teacher pensions bill will speak. The proposed legislation will be prepared in printed form and will be distributed at the convention, where it is hoped a majority of the teachers will become acquainted with its intent and purposes. Among the older teachers of Winona, opposition resulted in eliminating the provision calling for retirement at the age of 55 years.

JUSTICE BUNN NAMED.

Associate Justice, Defeated at Election, to Serve Unexpired Term.

St. Paul.—Associate Justice George L. Bunn of St. Paul, whose term of office expires January 1, received the appointment from Governor Eberhart to the position on the supreme bench vacated by Justice Calvin L. Brown, who was elected to the position of chief justice in the recent election. This was the governor's busy day for making appointments. Frank Catlin, chief of police in St. Paul, is named to succeed Oscar Hallam of the Ramsey district court, who was elected to a place on the supreme bench. Another appointment made is that of F. B. Wood, who is reappointed adjutant-general.

The appointment of Justice Bunn comes after a vigorous contest for the place. The elevation of Justice Brown to the chief justiceship caused the vacancy. Other candidates for the place were Attorney Carlson of the firm of Dunn & Carlson at Albert Lea. Harrison L. Schmidt of Mankato, Judge P. W. Morrison of Norwood, Judge McClenahan of Brainerd and Judge Homer Dibbell and W. A. Cant of Duluth.

Justice Bunn was first appointed by Governor Eberhart to succeed the late Justice Jaggard. He was a Democrat and Governor Eberhart's appointment was in anticipation of the action of the legislature in making the supreme court non-partisan in character. It is probably this consideration that prompted the governor to make the appointment in the present instance. Justice Bunn stands high with the bar of the state and is regarded as one of the ablest jurists on the bench.

Frank Catlin, who succeeds Judge Hallam on the Ramsey district bench, is a well known St. Paul lawyer who gave up his work temporarily to assist Mayor Keller in the St. Paul police department. His work in the police department has been high-grade in character and he enters upon his new duties with the confidence of the St. Paul bar.

The reappointment of Adjutant-General Wood was prophesied last week by the action of Colonel Earl D. Luce and Lieutenant-Colonel Corriston of Minneapolis, who, with the representatives of the national guard in St. Paul, recommended General Wood. A brigadier-general of the national guard will be elected later.

LONG ADMITS PART.

Prisoner Identified as Absconding Banker.

Atlanta, Ga., Dec. 2.—After repeated denials that he had ever lived in Minnesota, J. M. Long, now identified as H. W. Parker, alleged absconding banker of Winnebago, admitted to having once resided "near Winnebago." Beyond that he would say nothing. His girl wife has been identified as Florence Bauer, a former actress of Cleveland, O.

Pinkerton officials said that they had established beyond a doubt the identification of the West Point, Ga., citizen, believed to be H. W. Parker, the alleged absconding vice president, and have notified the sheriff of Blue Earth, Minn., to come for the prisoner.

The report of the identification experts was made Friday morning. The prisoner tallies precisely with every description of the fugitive bank official and although he stoutly maintains his innocence, Pinkertons are so convinced he is the correct man that action already is being taken for his action already is being taken for his prosecution.

Land Company Buys Bank

Mahnomen.—The stockholders of the Mahnomen Land company have just closed a deal whereby they became the owners of all the stock of the First National bank of this place. The new owners will take charge December 15. J. S. Jackson of Morgan, Minn., president of the Farmers' & Merchants' bank of that place, probably will be the new president of the First National, when the reorganization comes.

Barn and Livestock Burn.

Brainerd.—The large barn of Nels Gjergen, east of the city, burned, entailing a loss of $1,000. Frank Driver, who had in the barn four head of horses, two cows and 700 bushels of oats and ten tons of hay, sustained a loss of $1,100. Mott Hemmett had in the barn a horse and three cows. The barn and its contents were a total loss.

New Brighton Threatened.

Minneapolis.—An exciting early morning fire threw residents of the town of New Brighton, just outside of the northeast limits of Minneapolis, into a panic. The fire was in the two-story general store of Otto Schmaltzauer and for a time it seemed as though the entire business section would be destroyed.

TO TUNNEL UNDER CHANNEL

Long-Delayed France-English Project Is Once More Being Put Forward.

A tunnel between England and France beneath the English channel was first proposed at the beginning of the nineteenth century by Mathieu, a French mining engineer, says the Argonaut. Fifty years later the scheme was financed, but it was not until 1867 that it seemed that the projcet would be actually attempted. At that time there were a dozen or more plans for rail communication between the two countries. The accepted scheme was that of a tunnel bored beneath the bed of the channel. The estimated cost of the undertaking was about $50,000,000. Preliminary boring had been made, when the work was interrupted by the Franco-Prussian war. In 1874 the French and English governments resumed negotiations concerning the tunnel, leaving the matter in the hands of a joint commission. Failure on the part of the English company holding the contract for the work to receive sufficient funds resulted in the failure of the enterprise in 1880. Now the project is receiving some attention, a better feeling having been established between the people of the two countries.

Explaining What a Snob Really Is.

"Uncle Roy, what is a snob?"

"A snob, Eddie, is a person who inherits a great deal of money, goes abroad and buys himself a veneer of culture, returns home and poses as a connoisseur of something, and goes around calling his poor relations 'parvennes.' Why do you ask such a question, Eddie?"

"Because I heard Donald's big brother talking about you this afternoon and he said you were a snob."

WOMEN SHOULD NEVER USE HARSH PHYSICS

Women are especially susceptible to constipation and their more delicate organisms rebel at the violence of cathartics and purgatives. Drastic medicines like salts, mineral waters, pills and powders may afford temporary relief, but their violent action on the stomach and bowels tends to upset the entire system.

A mild laxative is far preferable and more effective. The combination of simple laxative herbs with pepsin prescribed by Dr. W. B. Caldwell, and sold in drug stores under the name of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, is ideal for women, being gentle in action, positive in effect and pleasant to the taste. A spoonful of Syrup Pepsin at night will bring natural relief next morning and, used regularly for a brief period, will so strengthen and tone the muscles of the stomach and bowels that there will be little, if any, further need for medicine.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin can be procured in any drug store. Your name and address on a postal to Dr. W. B. Caldwell, 203 West St., Monticello, Ill., will bring a free trial bottle by return mail. Adv.

King George Superstitious.

An incident which occurred while the king was out shooting recently over the Hon. John Ward's preserves at Woollsey shows that the monarch shares with many other persons the superstition about the number thirteen. The eight guns were joined at luncheon by five women of the party staying at Chilton, and the king noticing the unlucky number would not sit down until Donald Harding, the acting agent upon the estate, was called in to make the number up to fourteen.—New York Herald.

A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.
In this age of research and experiment, all nature is ransacked by the scientific for the comfort and happiness of man. Science has indeed made giant strides in the past century, and among the—by no means least important—discoveries in medicine is that of Therapion, which has been used with great success in French Hospitals and that it is worthy the attention of those who suffer from kidney, bladder, nervous diseases, chronic weaknesses, ulcers, skin eruptions, piles, &c., there is no doubt. In fact it seems evident from the big stir created amongst specialists, that THERAPION is destined to cast into oblivion all those questionable remedies that were formerly the sole reliance of medical men. It is of course impossible to tell sufferers all we should like to tell them in this short article, but those who would like to know more about this remedy that has effected so many—we might almost say, miraculous cures, should send addressed envelope for FREE book to Dr. Le Clerc Med. Co., Haverstock Road, Hampstead, London, Eng. and decide for themselves whether the New French Remedy "THERAPION" No. 1, No. 2 or No. 3 is what they require and have been seeking in vain during a life of misery, suffering, ill health and unhappiness. Therapion is sold by druggists or mail $1.00. Fougera Co., 90 Beekman St., New York.

I Invite Suffering Women

There is every reason why women should not trust their delicate constitutions in the hands of unskilled persons. It requires a thorough medical education to appreciate and understand the delicate female organism. There is every reason why she should write or personally consult an experienced specialist.

As a powerful, invigorating tonic, "Favorite Prescription" imparts strength to the whole system and to the organs distinctly feminine in particular. For "run-down," debilitated women of all occupations

As a soothing and strengthening nervine "Favorite Prescription" allays and subdues nervous excitability, irritability nervous exhaustion, and other distressing symptoms commonly attendant upon functional and organic diseases of the feminine organs. It induces refreshing sleep and relieves mental anxiety and despondency.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription is devised and put up by a physician of vast experience in the treatment of women's maladies. Its ingredients have the indorsement of leading physicians in all schools of practice.

The "Favorite Prescription" has been sold by dealers in medicine in its liquid form for over 40 years. Now it can also be obtained of them in tablet form—or send 50 one-cent stamps to Dr. Pierce for trial box.

"It Helped Me So Much."
Mrs. F. W. Myers, of Bodines, Pa., says: "Your 'Favorite Prescription' has done me a wonderful lot of good. "Seven years ago when our first child was born I was left miserable. I doctored with two physicians without any relief. I then went to see one of the head doctors in Williamsport; he said I must have an operation at once and that I should quit work, but that was something I could not do. I then began taking your 'Favorite Prescription' and it helped me so much. I always suffered so until our last child when I got along nicely. I shall never go through it again without your medicine. "Will close by wishing you much success in future."

The Northern Light

CHAS. W. LATTA

Editor and Publisher.

Published every Friday at Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota.

Subscription Price: $1.00 per year, strictly in advance.

Entered as second-class matter Sept. 22, 1911, at the post office at Holt, Minnesota, under the act of March 3, 1879.

Le Sueur news: With the election over and returns all in the Republican party should know something about revision downward, and be thoroughly satisfied that the Payne-Aldrich tariff was not the best ever.

Browns Valley Tribune: Some of the railroads of the state have announced a material reduction in freight on all material used for road building, and it is understood that other roads will follow suit. This is indeed a commendable act on the part of the railroad people. It is another indication of the great interest being taken by all classes of people in the improvement of the highways. The next five or ten years will witness some wonderful improvements in the roads of the rural districts of this state.

Roseau Region: The coming legislature will serve the state well if it devises some plan whereby the excessive cost of running our government will be lessened. It takes more than twice as much to conduct the affairs of state now as it required ten years ago. This is a matter that is causing thinking men to consider seriously if some remedy for reducing expenses can be found. Several state boards and bureaus should be abolished and others should be consolidated. A civil serlice law should be enacted and strict economy practiced in every state department.

Price Will Be Advanced

After January 1st, 1913, the subscription price of The Northern Light will be increased to $1.50 per year, payable in advance, and the paper will be regularly issued in 8-page size. Until December 31st subscriptions will be received at the present price of $1.00 in advance.

RARE "FIRST FOLIO" IS FOUND

Early Copy of Shakespeare's Play Is Brought to Light in Curious Manner.

Another copy of the very rare "first folio" of Shakespeare's plays has been brought to light in a strange manner. A sixteen-year-old son of a well-known baronet was exploring in the library of the earl of Dudley, at Whitley court, recently, when he came across a volume which he recognized as an early edition of the great dramatist's works. It had been rebound, and one or two pages were missing. At first the boy's discovery was not regarded as anything very special, but having seen a first folio of Shakespeare in the British museum, the young expert insisted on the importance of his find, and eventually the book was sent up to a leading firm of book dealers. They at once declared that the volume was a genuine first folio. Imperfect as the new find is, it is of considerable value. Only last year a similar copy was sold at auction for £1,190.

HEIGHT OF SMELTER STACKS

Saving in Metals in Smelting Process Increased With Altitude of Stack.

It is generally supposed that the stacks of smelters are built to a great height in order to get rid of the smoke. That is partially the reason, but it is principally because the higher the stack the greater the saving in metals to the smelting company. The action of the blast furnaces carries fine dust containing minute particles of gold or silver out with the fumes. This is first precipitated in what is called a dust chamber, a room several hundred feet in length and many times wider than the vent from the furnace. Much of the dust settles there. Then the fumes from the molten metal enter the stack. By that time their temperature is greatly reduced. The higher the stack the cooler the dust will become, and the wider it is the slower, relatively, it will move as it approaches the top. After it cools it loses a measure of its buoyancy and settles down to the base of the stack. The dust is gathered up by mechanical scrapers in the flue chambers, is dampened and pressed into little disks like biscuits. When these dry they are thrown back into the blast furnaces again.—Harper's Weekly.

HABIT OF FROWNING.

"Do you frown unconsciously from habit or defective eyesight?" asked an elderly woman of a young girl the other day. Continuing:

"Do you realize that each frown lessens your chance of popularity—your chance for making friends? You may not be so cross as you look, but the world is not going to take the trouble to discover it.

"Did you ever stop to think that no one admires a frown, therefore not the features of a Venus and the colorinig of a Henner can make up for the scowling lines between the eyes?

"Do you know that the frowning habit will limit your chance of success as a worker? A smiling countenance and the good disposition that generally accompanies it count for more in the business world than the frowner will ever believe.

"Whatever causes those frowns, be it temper, envy, fretfulness or bad eyes, should be fought against. It will take patience and constant watchfulness, but it can be done."

THE REASON.

"Somehow, the colors in that marine view don't seem to mix properly."

"That's because the artist painted a water scene with oil colors."

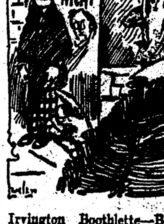
CIRCLING THE EARTH ON FOOT

Remarkable Party of Travelers Who Are on a Tour of Study and Research.

About a dozen well-to-do Germans, followers of the "simple life," and consisting of naturalists and their wives, a well-known writer, who acts as leader, and a photographer, arrived recently at the Buddhist monastery at Lausanne, Switzerland. They came from Leipzig, and are on a tour round the world on foot (several on bare feet), which they hope to accomplish "within five or six years." Their motto is taken from Heine: "God gave us two legs to walk with, and if he had wished us to be the slaves of the soil, one leg would have sufficed." The "simple life" devotees, who are all teetotalers and vegetarians, have undertaken this journey across three continents with a view to studying the religions and customs of the different countries, through which they pass. From Switzerland they go to Italy, Austria, Turkey, Asia Minor, Persia, India, Tibet, China, Japan and North America, returning by boat to Spain, whence they go to Lapland, returning eventually to Germany. All the travelers are in the best of health, and very enthusiastic over their plans.

IN OTHER WORDS



Irvington Boothlette—Base ingrate! You were dead-headed into the theater last night, and I am told you said the play was rotten!

Reporter (Muggstown Bazoo)—No, I said the play was a little more than a mellow drama!

ADEQUATE AMMUNITION.

Finley Peter Dunne, creator of Mr. Dooley, was dining with a friend at a New York restaurant. Rice birds were served. The tiny cadavers, picked and lean, were brought in upon large slices of toast. "Poor little things!" said the host. "Seems a shame to kill 'em—doesn't it? How do you suppose they ever murder enough rice birds to make a mess?"

Dunne turned over an infinitesimal specimen with a fork. "I don't know," he said, "unless they use insect powder!"—Saturday Evening Post.

ANOTHER SWINDLE.

Farmer Hayseed—No, I don't want any more labor savin' machines. I've tried enough of 'em. Look in there. That's a typewritin' machine my wife spent all her egg money to git for me, 'cause I ain't very handy with the pen. Just look at the swindle.

Agent—What's the matter with it?

Farmer Hayseed—Matter? Why, you can't even write y'r name with the thing unless you know how to play a church organ.

A DEAD TOWN.

"Yes; I visited Pompeii."

"Deadest town you ever saw, I'll bet."

"With one exception."

"What was it?"

"I once tried to run a newspaper in a town where nobody would advertise."

DRUG STORE COFFEE.

Customer (at soda fountain)—Have you any coffee flavor?

Clerk (briskly)—Yes, sir.

"Does it taste like coffee?"

"Um—er—n-o; but it looks like coffee—perfect picture of it, sir."

A CERTAINTY.

De Style—Do you think women will take part in the coming campaign?

Gunbusta—I know two that will—Anna Nias and Molly Coddle.—Judge.

Death of Hogan Anderson

Hogan Anderson died at 2 o'clock Tuesday afternoon at his home here after a two years illness from cancer of the stomach. The funeral was held at 1:30 o'clock this afternoon from the local Lutheran church, Rev. M. B. Ordahl officiating and the remains are laid to rest in the Holt cemetery.

Deceased was 66 years of age, being born near Throndhjem in Norway in 1846. He came to this country in 1872, settling at Chicago where he was married the same year to Miss Anna Reppe. Seven years later he took a homestead near Brookings, S. D., where the family resided until 1901, when he bought land adjoining the townsite here on which the family has made their home since. He is survived by his widow and four children, Guy, Alfred, Oscar and Minnie. No resident of this community was more highly respected than Hogan Anderson and the bereaved family have the sincere sympathy of all.

Here's hoping he has a Merry Christmas and return safe in the spring to finish up the best job of ditching work being done in this country.

Anton Peterson has been building a big new barn on his farm north of town and had the work along ready for putting on the roof boards. Farmers Removed Obstruction

Under the heading "Farmers Destroy Dam" the Minneapolis Journal a few days ago published the following interestsng news item from Fergus Falls:

"Interesting testimony is being introduced in the district court here in the Frazee dam case. The case is an action to enjoin H. E. Frazee from rebuilding the dam which was destroyed by farmers, whose lands were being flooded, on June 29.

The farmers who have gone on the stand have cheerfully admitted taking part in the destruction of the dam, and state they did so on the advice of an attorney. They do not speak of it as a dam but call it an obsttuction in the river. The dam was at the outlet of Lake Lizzie and the farmers claim there was no current there and that whatever head of water there was was secured by raising the water in a chain of lakes and flooding their lands. If Mr. Frazze can show that he maintained a dam in the legal sense ef the word for fifteen years, he will have the right to rebuild."

Dredges Have Closed Down

The cold snap of last week put the dredges at work in the Mud Lake district out of business for this season. The big Stevens dredge, on the Thief River, shut down Fribay, and the Arpin dredge, on Judicial Ditch No. 11, stopped work on Saturday.

The work done by the Stevens dredge is spoken of in the highest terms by the settlers, but there may be a nice bunch of damage suits [illegible] that is either untouched so far, or has been left in shape to cause some nasty flooding in the spring.

LIKELY STORY.

George Horace Lorimer of Philadelphia is a champion of scientific management, and at the Franklin Inn club he said the other day:

"Scientific management, the bonus system, piece work—all these are very good. They remind me of a story.

"In a certain shop all the men were paid by the hour. Discipline was lax there. The output was meager.

"One day, as a workman came from the shop, he held up his hand to a passing trolley car, the car stopped and waited for him, but he did not run to board it, nor did he increase by an iota his leisurely stride.

"The conductor, losing patience at last, shouted to him: 'Come on, get a move on.' Do a little piece work for a change."

GREAT SENSE OF FEELING

Marcus Could Tell Where He Was by Putting His Hand Out of Car Window.

One of two darkies who run a bootblack "parlor" in partnership was bragging of his well-developed sense of touch, particularly in the matter of money. He boasted that he could tell the denomination of any United States coin by feeling it. His uartner wearied of these boasts and came back with this:

"Your sense o' feelin' ain't nothing to my friend Marcus. Him and me used to work on the Pullman down through Kansas. Marcus had been on this route for about ten years. One night when we was both a-sleepin', 'long around midnight, I wakes up and I shakes Marcus, and I says, 'Marcus, where are we?' An' Marcus he jest rolls over and sticks his hand out the window and he says, 'We're goin' through Oswego.'"

PAWNSHOPS FOR AUTOS.

The Mont de Piete, the great pawnshop of Paris, is taking thought for those of its patrons who may be automobilists or aviators. Its authorities are now negotiating for the acquisition of an immense garage, capable of holding 2,000 cars, so that people who pawn their automobiles may be able to leave them there and thus avoid the present expense of at least six francs a day which pawning an automobile has hitherto meant. Space will also be provided for aeroplanes.—New York Sun.

CASHMERE SHAWL IS COSTLY

Half a Century Ago That Silky Drapery Was Highly Prized by the Women.

The dear ambition of the woman of half a century ago was to possess a real Cashmere shawl.

It was in France that the hair of the Cashmere goat was first esteemed for the making of shawls, the silky substance of which, allied to their exquisite drapery possibilities, was their great fascination.

White hair of the common Italian goat is imported for carpet manufacture. There is also imported white hair of the Siberian goat, the shorter lengths of which are used in carpet making and the longer for various purposes.

The most costly of all the white animal hairs imported is that of the camel. The camel is commonly of a dirty brown in color, but parts of its body may be white, as may be streaks in its mane, called veins. The camel's hair is of superior strength, and its fine white hair of sufficient length is used as a substitute for natural white human hair.

The long, white hair of the Syrian goat is as fine as human hair, in place of which it is used for some special purposes, principally for the making of theatrical wigs and beards.

JURY FINDS AUERBACH GUILTY

CONVICTED OF KILLING BUSINESS PARTNER.

Shooting Took Place in Michigan Woods—Victim Was Chicago Man.

Baldwin, Mich., Dec. 10.—A jury in the circuit court declared O. M. Auerbach guilty of first degree murder for the shooting of his business partner, Harry Fisher, a Chicago business man and promoter. Fisher was killed in the woods near here last September while the two men were on a hunting trip.

The case was given to the jury Saturday night and when the verdict was announced Sunday morning, only the prisoner, his counsel, court attendants and Judge Charles A. Withey were in the courtroom.

Auerbach, standing beside the sheriff, heard the verdict in silence. His face was clouded by a deep scowl, but he uttered no word. Attorney Spencer L. Adams, Auerbach's counsel, gave notice of appeal to the supreme court.

The trial began last Monday. All the evidence introduced by the state was circumstantial, there being no witnesses of the shooting.

Shot While on Hunting Trip.

Fisher, his wife and children, and Auerbach came here late last summer, taking up their residence on a fruit farm, which Fisher recently had purchased, near Big Star lake.

On the morning of Sept. 19, taking with them only a high-powered rifle, the two men went into the woods to hunt partridges. A short time afterwards Auerbach rushed into a nearby farmhouse and reported that Fisher had been accidentally shot. The dead man's body was carried to an undertaker's establishment in this place, and, according to testimony given at the trial, both Mrs. Fisher and Auerbach endeavored to have it shipped to Iowa without the formality of a coroner's inquest. The inquest was held, however, and Auerbach was held responsible for the shooting.

Claims Shooting Was Accidental.

According to Auerbach's story, while passing through the woods he stopped to roll a cigarette, standing the rifle against a stump. The weapon accidentally fell and was discharged, the bullet passing through Fisher's body. Evidence at the trial tended to disprove this contention, it being shown the bullet passed through the body in a different direction from that which would be taken by a missile fired by a rifle lying on the ground. It also was demonstrated that the weapon had not been discharged in the manner claimed by Auerbach.

Fisher's life was insured for about $200,000, the policies being made payable to his wife. It was the theory of the prosecution that friendship between Auerbach and Mrs. Fisher was the motive for the murder.

Declared Fisher Failed.

Chicago.—Harry W. Fisher was a promoter here, but had suffered business reverses, and, so far as is known, the 240-acre fruit farm tract in Lake county, Mich., where he was killed, was the last of his active enterprises.

Well Known in St. Paul.

St. Paul.—Oscar M. Auerbach is the son of Maurice Auerbach, one of the pioneer jobbers and capitalists of St. Paul, whose home now is in Washington. The family left here about seven years ago, up to which time it has been among the most prominent in the financial and social world.

"The Pen That Fits Every Hand"

Made-to-Order Kind.

"My wife is always bringing home so much toothpowder," complained a man the other day to a friend. "It's a waste of money. As for me I just take the bathtub cleanser and scrub my teeth."

The pair were walking down Chestnut street and his companion stopped in amazement. "What! Doesn't it hurt your teeth and gums, too?" he exclaimed almost in horror.

"No," came back the surprising reply. "You see they're the kind you buy at the dentist's."

Thanksgiving Query.

A little girl on awakening Thanksgiving morning was asked what she was thankful for.

"Oh, a big turkey dinner and no school," was the prompt reply.

"But," inquired her mother in surprise, "are you not thankful that you have papa and mamma?"

"Oh, I can be thankful for them any day."

ELECT NORTHFIELD MAN.

Dean Weigle of Carleton College Unopposed for Presidency of Minnesota Educational Association.

St. Paul—L. A. Weigle, dean of Carleton college at Northfield, was elected president of the Minnesota Educational association. He was nominated for office at the association's first business session of the fiftieth annual convention in the Auditorium. David F. Swenson of the University of Minnesota also was nominated, but withdrew.

The nominations followed the adoption of an amendment to articles of incorporation radically affecting the organization. As a result of the new plan of organization, the teachers held an election with the Australian method of balloting at each convention. Polls were erected in the lobby of the Auditorium where the teachers cast their ballots.

Four Thousand Get to Vote.

Through the change in organization affected approximately 4,000 teachers were allowed to vote, instead of less than 1,000, as formerly has been the case. This feature was permitted because the association voted to abolish the $1 initiation fee. Hereafter active members will be those who pay annual dues of $1. The change in the organization is a victory for the liberal element, and settles a factional fight of years' standing in the association ranks.

Under the terms of reorganization, the association will have a board of directors of seven members instead of five trustees as formerly. The president, vice president and former president will become members of the board, including two two-year members, and two one-year members.

The New Committees.

Committees appointed by George F. James, Minneapolis, president, are as follows:

Legislative—John L. Silvernale, Red Wing; J. M. McConnell, Mankato; Philip E. Carlson, Albert Lea; Miss Belle Rood, St. Paul; Miss A. E. Shelland, International Falls.

Resolutions—Raymond D. Kent, Winona; Miss Grace Baldwin, Minneapolis; Miss Georgina Lommen, Coledoma.

Finance—Albert Gulette, Minneapolis; F. E. Lurton, Anoka; Milton C. Potter, St. Paul.

WOULD MARRY NIECE.

Baltimore Resident Seeks Far and Wide for Court Clerk Who Will Grant License.

Minneapolis.—W. B. Bamburger, 2300 Calhoun avenue, Baltimore, is looking for a state in which the law permits a man to marry his niece.

In a letter received by P. S. Neilson, clerk of the district court, Bamburger said that he desired to marry his sister's daughter, but had yet been unable to find a district court clerk who would grant him a license. As a result he is writing to every district court clerk in the United States.

Under the laws of Minneosta marriage is not permitted within the fourth degree of relationship. The nearest is that of second cousins.

Factory Inspector Visits Winona.

Winona.—Miss Louise Klapp, state factory inspector and a member of the department of women and children of the state labor bureau, has been in this city several days. She found conditions here good in the main, although regulations had been overstepped a little along certain lines, the principal violation being the employment of girls after 7 p. m.

Barber Charged With Murder.

Northfield.—That George Morrison, who was found dead in his room in a local hotel last Friday, met his death at the hands of Arthur Kallak, was the verdict of the jury impaneled by Coroner Bollonbach of Faribault. Kallak is a barber, 20 years old, and his home is in Faribault. Morrison was a tailor, 28 years old, whose parents are supposed to live in Winnipeg.

Herds Will Be Improved.

Clinton.—Professor A. B. Lathrop, who is employed in Big Stone county as county demonstrator, has been canvassing the county for stock improvement and has aroused such interest that several cars of registered stock will be brought into the county this winter.

School Gardens In St. Paul.

St. Paul. — The St. Paul school gardens were restored to the budget for next year at the meeting of the conference committee. An appropriation of $2,500 was made for the purpose.

Parker's Associates Arrested.

Winnebago.—John Sharp, who is the president of the defunct Bank of Commerce of Winnebago, has been arrested at Dexter, Minn., by Deputy Sheriff Loft of Winnebago. The charge against Sharp was sworn out by the state banking department. He is charged with swearing to false statements of the financial condition of the bank, and is further charged with obstructing the superintendent of banks in the official discharge of his duties. The warrant was sworn out by a deputy state bank examiner.

J. J. HILL SPEAKS.

Argues That Scientific and Religious Facts Go Hand in Hand, at Warren, Minn.

Warren.—James J. Hill, empire builder, played a new role here. He preached a sermon, and it was eloquent. Repeating the Biblical story of the creation, he proved that scientific and religious facts do not conflict but bear each other out.

The railroad magnate exhorted his hearers to apply themselves more to Christianity, asserting, in the course of his extemporaneous sermon, "No nation can long exist without earnest Christian spirit behind it."

Mr. Hill was speaking to hundreds of farmers and business men who braved zero weather to hear him and take part in the North Star college celebration. The "Empire Builder" met a cordial reception and before leaving the city he announced: "When you are ready to make plans for an endowment for the college send me word and I will be with you." Thereupon he was given an ovation that lasted several minutes.

Mr. Hill made an inspection of the new college building at 1 o'clock, when he addressed the students. At 2 o'clock he addressed a large audience at the Opera house. District Judge John A. Gindland presided. The judge in his introductory remarks referred to Mr. Hill as the discoverer of the fertility of Red River Valley lands as well as the pioneer in practical cultivation.

RINES TO BE SPEAKER

Wins Out Against Opposition in Minnesota Legislature.

St. Paul.—Hon. Henry Rines of Mora will be speaker of the Minnesota house this winter. Following a statement by Mr. Rines, giving the names of sixty-eight of the 120 members pledged to his support, all of his rival republican candidates, withdrew and extended their congratulations.

In Mr. Rines' statement he declares that he has made not a single pledge or promise of committee assignments or patronage in order to get votes, and that he is absolutely independent. He says this shows that "the old order of things is passing away."

Will Give Its Funds to Roads.

Mankato.—The Mankato Automobile club held its annual meeting and chose R. E. Brown president, C. H. Saulpagh, vice president; B. Bangerter, Jr., treasurer, and C. A. Ingwalson, secretary. It was decided to continue to affiliate with the Minnesota Automobile association, and also to devote practically all of the club's funds to good roads work. The sum of $800 was appropriated to help improve three roads leading out of the city. A midwinter banquet is also to be held.

Sells 165,000 Acres.

Fergus Falls.—Concluding a state land sale here Saturday by selling 2,200 acres of land at prices ranging from $5 to $21 an acre, State Auditor Iverson completed the last of the state land sales for the year, and announced that he had disposed of 165,000 acres at average price of $8.50 an acre, against 169,000 acres last year at an average of $7 and acre. This means that Mr. Iverson has brought into the state treasury $1,402,500 this year.

Woman Attacked At Kasota.

St. Peter.—Ruthlessly struck down from in back and then beaten into insensibility, Mrs. Gertrude Winslow was assaulted in the outskirts of Kasota village. Several hundred armed men patrolled the road and searched the woods in all directions from the town until long after dark, but no trace of the woman's assailant has been found.

Strife in Winona Church.

Winona.—Strife has broken out in the German Baptist church here. The pastor, Rev. Oscar Autritt, has attempted to read some of the members out and to have himself called for pastor for another year. His opponents refuse to recognize the legality of his action and deny that any regularly called church meeting has been held, and say they will secure another pastor.

Two Hurt in Road Smashup.

Winona.—While driving into the village of Galesburg, across the river from Winona, the automobile of Henry Frase of Osseo, Wis., collided in the darkness with a rig driven by Julius Mason. The automobile, occupied by Frase and his two sisters, was wrecked; Miss Maude Frase was made unconscious, the horse was killed and the buggy demolished.

Commission Form Wins.

Duluth.—Returns indicate that Duluth overwhelmingly adopted the commission form of government. Twenty-nine out of forty-four voting precincts report a total of 4,835 vote for and 2,181 against. Returns are in from the central wards, where the opposition was strongest, and it is believed the present proportion will at least be maintained in the city totals. The new charter was opposed by the Socialists, liquor and other special interests.

Push Sale of Red Cross Seals.

The American Red Cross has already printed over 85,000,000 Red Cross Christmas seals and probably the edition will number 100,000,000 before the end of the campaign. If the anticipations of the anti-tuberculosis workers are realized, no less than $400,000 will be obtained from the sale of Red Cross seals. Practically all of the money remains in the state or city where the seals are sold, only a very small percentage of it is going to pay for the cost of the printing and distributing the seals and for the expense of running the campaign.

In case any persons cannot obtain seals in the community where they live, they can secure them by writing to Red Cross Seal Headquarters, 715 Union Trust Building, Washington, D. C. Red Cross seals cost one cent each and every seal sold is a bullet in the fight against tuberculosis.

RASH ON FACE FOR 2 YEARS

Sioux Falls, S. D.—"My trouble of skin disease started merely as a rash on my face and neck, but it grew and kept getting worse until large scabs would form, fester and break. This was just on the one side of my face, but it soon scattered to the other side. I suffered a great deal, especially at night, on account of its itching and burning. I would scratch it and of course that irritated it very much. This rash was on my face for about two years, sometimes breaking out lots worse and forming larger sores. It kept me from sleeping day or night for a couple of months. My face looked disgraceful and I was almost ashamed to be seen by my friends.

"A friend asked me to try Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. I would bathe my face with hot water and a lot of Cuticura Soap, then I would put on the Cuticura Ointment. In less than two days' time, the soreness and inflammation had almost entirely disappeared, and in four weeks' time you could not see any of the rash. Now my face is without a spot of any kind. I also use them for my scalp and hair. They cured me completely." (Signed) Miss Pansy Hutchins, Feb. 6, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

Good Job.

"Now Johnny," said the teacher after she had explained the meaning of the word. "I wish you would write a sentence containing defeat."

After a struggle which lasted for about twenty minutes Johnny announced that he was ready to be heard.

"Please read your composition," the teacher directed.

"When you git shoes dat's too tite," Johnny read, "it's hard on de feet."

NEVER TIRES

Of the Food That Restored Her to Health.

"Something was making me ill and I didn't know the cause," writes a Colo. young lady: "For two years I was thin and sickly, suffering from indigestion and inflammatory rheumatism.

"I had tried different kinds of diet, and many of the remedies recommended, but got no better.

"Finally, Mother suggested that I try Grape-Nuts, and I began at once, eating it with a little cream or milk. A change for the better began at once.

"To-day I am well and am gaining weight and strength all the time. I've gained 10 lbs. in the last five weeks and do not suffer any more from indigestion, and the rheumatism is all gone.

"I know it is to Grape-Nuts alone that I owe my restored health. I still eat the food twice a day and never tire of it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The flavour of Grape-Nuts is peculiar to itself. It is neutral, not too sweet and has an agreeable, healthful quality that never grows tiresome.

One of the sources of rheumatism is from overloading the system with acid material, the result of imperfect digestion and assimilation.

As soon as improper food is abandoned and Grape-Nuts is taken regularly, digestion is made strong, the organs do their work of building up good red blood cells and of carrying away the excess of disease-making material from the system.

The result is a certain and steady return to normal health and mental activity. "There's a reason." Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Entered as second-class matter Sept. 22, 1911, at the post office at Holt, Minnesota, under the act of March 3, 1879.

It begins to look as if the International Harvester Co. is actually in the trust class, if we are to believe evidence submitted at the hearing now in progress in St. Paul.

A news item in the Duluth Herald says: "H. K. Hanson, of Stillwater has found a sure cure for hog cholera, according to a letter he has written Governer Eberhart." We have not heard of either the governor or Ed. Smith being ill.

Senator Clapp has introduced a bill prohibiting the sending of campaign funds from one state to another. The average country editor should not have any serious objection to this bill becoming a law, as it would not interfere materially with his revenues.

It is announced that the Public Examiner is going after the State Board of Control with an axe. The present state administration undoubtedly realizes that there must shortly be a great smashup in its machine shop unless it can get control of the Board of Control, and the appointments made by that board.

Its a caution the way the various governments squander money in trying to devise some better way to kill off the subjects of their neighbor governments. One of Uncle Sam's new toy guns, a $130,000 trifle, busted the other day while being tried out. It had been shot off several times for experimental purposes at a cost of a small fortune every time it was fired. Finally it was definitely ascertained just what size of a load it wouldn't stand, so now it will be in order to build a few more just like it.

RELIC OF DAVID LIVINGSTON.

Publisher Has Letter the Great Explorer Wrote on Newspaper When in the Jungle.

An interesting relic of Livingstone, the great explorer and missionary, which will be on view at the forthcoming centenary celebration in London, is a letter written on a copy of the Standard for November 24, 1869.

The fragment is in the possession of Mr. Murray, the publisher, who has a collection of Livingstone mementos. The explorer wrote his letter in the wilds of Africa after his stock of ink had given out, but as a substitute he made a colored liquid from the juice of plants. Unfortunately it is difficult to read the writing after all these years, for it has faded to a dull terra cotta shade, and in some places is so pale as to be undecipherable.

A curious point is that the fragment of the Standard on which the letter is written contains an account of Livingstone's work in Africa.

Over the printed words Livingstone traced his letter in the lonely jungle. The letter is written in a bold hand.

"The valleys into which the water is led," he says in the opening sentence, "are covered with a thick sward of wiry, damp loving grass and other aquatic plants up to the verge of the forest." Unfortunately this sentence is practically the only one which can be read with little difficulty, and much is impossible to read with the naked eye.

ALASKA'S TWO CLIMATES.

Official reports indicate that the coast region of Alaska has much rain and snow, but an equable temperature, and that the winter at Sitka is no colder than at Washington. The snowfall at Valdez has reached 60 feet, and the rainfall at Sitka 111 inches in a season. The Yukon basin, on the other hand, has a continental climate, very cold in the winter, although the summer temperature may reach 90 degrees Fahrenheit in the shade. The rainfall is small. The soil is permanently frozen for several yards below the surface, but a thin surface layer thaws out every summer.—Harper's Weekly.

NEW YORK'S LATEST.

New York's fine taste for novelties has lately manifested itself in a "Parisian cafe and ladies' bar." Another notable sight for the middle westerners to talk about when they go back home. New York leads the world in commercial vulgarity.—Springfield Republican.

HE WAS AN ACQUIRED TASTE

Pretty Compliment That Was Paid to Richard Wilson, Painter, by Certain Ladies.

Richard Wilson, the English landscape painter, was not of a pliant disposition; conscious of his own merits, he disdained to humble himself to those who measure men by rank and value them by pounds. But as is shown by this pretty story, told in "Walnuts and Wine," Wilson's friends liked him no less for his brusque manner:

Goldsmith, Sterne, Wilson and Dr. Johnson were assembled at Garrick's house with a party of ladies for supper.

"We were very lively at your expense indeed, gentlemen," said Mrs. Garrick, rallying them for having arrived late. "To punish you for not obeying our summons, the ladies likened you all to plants and fruits and flowers."

"Pray let us hear," said Wilson. "Doubtless I come in for a sprig of laurel."

"No, sir," said the pretty, lively lady, "you are wrong."

"For rue, perchance," said he.

"No, sir; guess again."

"Why, I am dubbed bitter enough; perhaps a crab," said he, "for that man" (pointing to Garrick) "has dubbed me Sour Dick."

"Guess again," said Mrs. Garrick, laughing. "Will you give it up?"

"Yes, madam."

"Why, then, sir, you are likened to olives. Now, will you dare to inquire further?"

"Let me see," said Wilson, with all eyes upon him. "Well, then, my dear, out with it! I dare."

"Then know, sir," said she, rising and curtsying most gravely, "Mr. Wilson is rough to the taste at first, tolerable by a little longer acquaintance, and delightful at last."—Youth's Companion.

HE HEARD IT

Dickson—So you were at the inauguration eh? Hear the oath taken?

Wickson—Did I? Say, when I stepped on the pet corn of a man in that crowd I heard a dozen oaths taken.

TOLD OF THE COLLEGIAN.

A former jest, much used, was the one about the college graduate who tried to get a job, and on being asked for his credentials showed his diploma. "What—a college man?" cried the boss. "Yes, but I'll try to forget it!" answered the applicant. The new variation is a true story because it's new. A successful Cleveland business man of the old school interviewed his nephew—a recent alumnus of a great institution of learning—the other day. Finally the old man said: "Billy, you have an unusual amount of knowledge for a man just graduated from college." "Yes, grandpop, I have," candidly admitted the boy. "But I explain it this way: I had a good common school education before I went there!"

VERSATILE POET.

"Biffers, the bard, wrote an autumn sonnet."

"Did he succeed in selling it?"

"No, but he thinks he can change the color scheme, substitute 'glad' for 'sad' in several places, and make it do very well for a spring poem."

INSIDIOUS SCHEME.

"Rosa, my mother-in-law is coming for a long visit tomorrow. Here is a list of her favorite dishes."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, the first time you give us one of these you'll get a week's notice."—Fliegende Blaetter.

NO MISTAKE ABOUT IT.

"I understand the Spudkins are sojourning in Paris."

"How could you help but understand it? This town has been flooded with Paris postcards ever since they got there."

WERE ON THE FIRE ALREADY

Too Late for Julius to See That Sylvester Rawlings' Eggs Were Fresh.

Mr. Sylvester Rawlings, the musical critic, became hungry the other day. And so he walked a long way to get to a restaurant in which he is acquainted. The waiter, Julius, is a particular friend of Mr. Rawlings. That gentleman has always cherished the belief that Julius has served him well. He thinks that from time to time Julius has won better food for him than is set forth upon the menu.

"Bring me two or three fried eggs Julius," Mr. Rawlings ordered.

"Chess, sir, Mr. Rawlings," said Julius. "At once, sir."

And Julius hurried to the kitchen walking in the duck-footed haste of the perfect waiter. By and by he returned to Mr. Rawlings' side, to place the silver and do other little chores about the table. Mr. Rawlings thought he would have a bit of fun with Julius.

"Ah, Julius," said Mr. Rawlings. "By the way, Julius. See that those eggs are fresh, Julius."

"Too late, sir," said the grave Julius. "They're on the fire now."—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

SHE DID NOT FEEL HER AGE

Swiss Woman Therefore Altered Figures on Her Marriage Certificate and Was Fined.

It seems an outrage that a young woman should be fined for understating her age, but this crime has actually been committed in Switzerland. It is true that she changed the figures on a marriage certificate, but this only shows that she had the courage of her convictions. Now, it seems that in Switzerland even women are forbidden to tamper with official documents, and so the lady was prosecuted in due form and fined 2 shillings by a judge who ought to have been recalled upon the spot. The lady's defense was a good one. The certificate stated her age was twenty-nine, whereas we all know a woman is no older than she feels, the certificate was clearly a false and a lying one, and so she changed the figures in defense of public morals. Nothing could be clearer, more convincing or more logical, but the judge—a mere man—refused to look at it that way.

PLEA FOR TRICK ANIMALS.

No dog or horse or cat ever finds it according to its nature to jump through flaming hoops, roll barrels, walk a tight rope or do scores of other things it is forced to do by trainers, says Our Dumb Animals. The lump of sugar or the bit of meat given deceives no one who knows anything about animals. Refusal to applaud, persuading children not to attend these exhibitions because of the cruelty that is behind them, influencing one's friends against the whole scheme of making money through trick animals—these are some of the ways in which we may help.

FEARFUL.

"Why have the children so suddenly decided they don't want to go with us on the sailing party?"

"I think it was because they heard their father say there would be a spanking breeze."

British Heir Not Having Usual Habit of the Family, May Lose Estate.

"My grandfather snored, my father snored, my mother snored, and I have always snored. Edward never snores. He is no son of mine."

These few lines in the will of Edward Arthur Bentinck Monckton, Baron Hetherington, have thrown a huge estate into the probate court of England and question the legitimacy of the succeeding heir.

The late baron's nephew claims succession to the estate under the will and will also lay claim to the peerage. The man who for [illegible] has been accepted as the lawful son of the old lord has entered a caveat, alleging that the will is prima facie proof of his father's insanity.

The case is attracting national interest.—New York Tribune.

JUST JUDGE.

"It's all right to fine me, judge," laughed Barrowdale, after the proceedings were over, "but just the same you were ahead of me in your car, and if I was guilty you were too."

"Bully for you!" said Barrowdale. "By the way, do you put these fines back into the roads?"

"No," said the judge. "They go to the trial jestice in loo o' sal'ry."—Harper's Weekly.

WHITELAW REID, U.S. AMBASSADOR, DEAD

NOTED DIPLOMAT TO GREAT BRITAIN SUCCUMBS TO OEDEMA.

END COMES PEACEFULLY

Wife and Daughter There—President Taft Will Name Successor Within a Few Weeks.

London, Dec. 17.—Whitelaw Reid, the American ambassador the Great Britain since 1905, is dead at his London residence, Dorchester house, from pulmonary oedema. The end was quite peaceful. Mrs. Reid and their daughter, Mrs. John Hubert Ward, were at the bedside.

The ambassador had been unconscious since 9 o'clock in the morning and at intervals during the previous 24 hours he had been slightly delirous as a result of the drugs administered to induce sleep.

Doctors Issue Bulletin.

Dr. Barlow, physician to the king, who was called in last week when Mr. Reid's illness became acute, and his regular physician, Dr. William Hale White, issued the following bulletin as to the cause of death:

"A fortnight ago the American ambassador had a slight bronchial attack, similar to others from which he had suffered at considerable intervals. On Wednesday last, asthma supervened, and the asthmatic paroxysms became very severe, leading to extreme exhaustion.

"It was hoped that he might rally, as no pneumonic symptoms had appeared. With difficulty, the paroxysms of asthma were got under control, but Sunday morning the exhaustion became extreme, and he later died from pulmonary oedema."

Court Learns of Death.

The Hon. John Hubert Ward, who, with his wife, had been at Dorchester house continually since the ambassador's condition became serious, notified the staff of the embassy when the patient began to sink and when death came he sent word to the king and queen at Buckingham palace, the queen's mother, Alexandra, at Sandringham, and the officials at the court. Almost immediately the king sent his equery, Sir Harry Legge, to express the condolence of himself and the queen.

During the afternoon messages conveying the warmest sympathy were received from the queen mother, Alexandra, and other members of the royal family, court officials, members of the government and of the various embassies and legations, while many who had heard the news of the ambassador's death or who had seen the flags at half mast on Dorchester house, called at the embassy.

A wireless message was also sent to Ogden Reid, son of the ambassador, who left New York Saturday in the hope of reaching his father's bedside before death.

Body to Come Home.

The body will be sent home and probably will be interred in Sleepy Hollow, but the details will not be decided upon until some communication is received from Ogden Reid it is learned what action the British government may desire to take.

Mrs. Reid hopes to sail on Saturday next, should her son reach England in time to accompany her, but in all probability the government will place a warship at the disposal of the family for the transportation of the body of the ambassador to the United States.

There also will doubtless be a memorial service in one of the great cathedrals in London, in addition to services in some small chapel for members of the family and the staff of the embassy. This being Sunday, nothing could be done, but if Mrs. Reid has her way she will start for home at the earliest possible moment.

Successor Within a Few Weeks.

Washington.—The American ambassadorship at London will not long be left vacant. Although President Taft was said not to have decided at this time upon a successor to Mr. Reid, it is understood that he will fill the place within a few weeks. The president regards the diplomatic problems in which this country and Great Britain are at present entangled as too important to leave the United States unrepresented even for a few months at the court of St. James.

Within the next few days and probably during his trip to Panama, the president will scan carefully names of men he considers available for the post and a nomination may be sent to the senate early in the year. The president is understood to be hopeful that the senate will confirm any nomination for this ambassadorship which he sends in.

MUMM'S ASSAILANT YET FREE

"MRS. MARY BARNES" AND HER SERVANTS AT LIBERTY.

French Sportsman Says Woman Fire When He Told Her They Must Part.

Paris, Dec. 17.—The efforts of the police to locate either "Mrs. Mary Barnes" or her servants, the only actual witnesses of the shooting on Thursday night of Walter Mumm, a well known sportsman, thus far have been fruitless and the affair remains more or less a mystery. Mumm was shot while in the woman's home.

Mr. Mumm, in the interrogation by Magistrate Boucard at the hospital, strongly protested against that version of the shooting which said that he struck "Mrs. Barnes" before she fired.

"I was very fond of Mrs. Barnes," said Mumm to the magistrate, "but I think she was even fonder of me. My family, however, made me understand that the situation between us could not continue. Mrs. Barnes was separated from her husband not divorced and accordingly could not be my wife.

"In view of our possible separation I tried to prepare my friend. Wednesday we took supper at a restaurant in the Rue Royal. The evening passed gaily. Champagne flowed perhaps a little too freely, and when we returned, tired and enervated to Mrs. Barnes' home in the Rue Belles Ferrilles, dawn already was breaking.

"Then we began a dispute. I repeated to her that our love could not last forever. Mrs. Barnes, who up to this time had not been much moved over the prospect of our parting then had a crying fit which was followed by an outburst of fury. 'Ah, it won't last forever. We will see about that.' she screamed, and before I could interfere she snatched up a little revolver and fired at me."

M. Boucard here interrupted M. Mumm.

"Didn't you yourself fire the first shot? It is said the woman is wounded and, instead of having fled to London that she is in a private hospital near Paris."

"No," replied M. Mumm. "Mrs. Barnes cannot invoke the excuse of legitimate defense. I neither shot nor struck her. When she fired I disarmed her. Certainly I did not do it very gently. It was brutal, but that is all."

PERJURY IS AGAIN CHARGED IN CASE

"DYNAMITE WITNESS HELD FOR TESTIFYING FALSELY AT INDIANAPOLIS.

TELLS ANOTHER STORY.

Thomas Taggart, Democratic Chief, Also Appears on Stand—Evidence as Taken.

Indianapolis, Dec. 16. — Jail on charges of perjury for Frederick W. Zeiss, Chicago, a union iron worker; the testimony of Thomas Taggart, Democratic national committeeman, about an explosion, and speeches and reports in which the iron workers' international union was accused of approving of the defiance of law in its strike, are the latest developments at the "dynamite conspiracy" trial.

Zeiss, the second witness for the defense to be held to the federal grand jury on charges of perjury, was a room-mate of Ortie E. McManigal, when McManigal blew up a building in Detroit in June, 1907.

Charged with Changing.

He is charged with telling the truth before the federal grand jury last winter when the indictments in the dynamite cases were returned, and with testifying falsely now in an effort to impeach McManigal's confession.

Last winter the district attorney said Zeiss asserted McManigal never had confided to him about explosions, which was in accord with what McManigal had said. Yesterday Zeiss testified McManigal not only confided in him, but also offered to "split up" with him if he (Zeiss) would help do the dynamiting.

Kern Cross-Questions Him.

In response to questions by Senator John W. Kern of the defense, Zeiss testified that McManigal had told him all obout the explosion, had invited him to go to Bloomville, Ohio, to procure more dynamite, and had said Herbert S. Hockin would pay both of them for future "jobs."

His narrative completed, Zeiss was passed to the government.

Mr. Taggart on Stand.

Mr. Taggart's appearance was for the defense. He said ten days before an explosion on a building in the course of construction at French Lick, Ind., on March 20, 1911, Fred Sherman, a union business agent who is a defendant, talked with him about unioning the job and the question of unionizing it was considered when the explosion occurred. Senator Kern put questions to Mr. Taggart as tending to show there was no motive for the defendants to blow up work when it soon was to be unionized.

The government repeatedly objected to Mr. Taggart's testimony as "incompetent and irrelevant."

"Did you know any arrangements were on to blow up the job?" asked the district attorney.

"I knew of none," answered Mr. Taggart.

"All you could do was to request the contractor to unionize it so it would not be blown up. Is that it?"

"I didn't know it was to be blown up."

"And you don't know who blew it up, do you? That's all."

The explosion was charged to James B. McNamara.

Speeches made by Emil Seidel, then Socialist mayor of Milwaukee, before the convention of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers in Milwaukee in September 1911, and referring to the arrest of John J. McNamara, the dynamiter, as a "kidnaping," and reports before the iron workers' convention at Rochester N. Y., in September, 1910, the month before the Los Angeles Times building was blown up, were introduced by the government through the examination of Paul J. Morrin, St. Louis, a defendant.

Hate to Lose Bryce.

New York, Dec. 16.—Regret that James Bryce, the British ambassador, is about to retire from that post was expressed at a dinner here in his honor, coupled with the hope that he would find himself able to attend the celebration in this country in 1914 of the one-hundredth anniversary of peace between English speaking peoples. The dinner was given by the American committee in charge of that celebration.

Hamilton, Bermuda, Dec. 16.—"Friday, the thirteenth, is a lucky day with which to end my vacation," said President-elect Woodrow Wilson in a moment of leisure between packing and bidding farewell to his acquaintances, preparatory to his departure for the United States.

New York Housewives May Aid.

New York, Dec. 16.—The Housewives' league of this city may inaugurate a campaign to reduce the price of eggs. Mrs. Julian Heath, president of the local organization, is in Philadelphia, visiting Mrs. Derr, head of the Housekeepers' league, who have started a campaign against the dealers of that city. Mrs. Heath has been following the campaign in Philadelphia and it is believed the local organization may take similar action.

SERVIAN PRESS HITS AUSTRIA

MILITARY PARTY OF LATTER COUNTRY DESIRES RUPTURE.

All the Peace Plenipotentiaries in London for Conference.

London, Dec. 16.—"During recent days the Servian press has surpassed itself in vituperation of Austria-Hungary," says a dispatch to the Daily Telegraph from Vienna. "The Servian military party clearly desires a complete rupture and is receiving the strongest support from the Belgrade newspapers, which vaunt the brilliant prowess of the Servian army in the present campaign and compare Austria-Hungary with Turkey.

"They assert that the Servians would be certain to gain a victory against the Austrian forces, armed with old artillery, while such a war would threaten the very existence of the Hapsburg monarchy, because it would be impossible for Austria to occupy Servia without conjuring a European war, which would end in the disruption and partition of Austria-Hungary between Italy, Russia, Roumania and Servia."

Peace Envoys in London.

London.—All plenipotentiaries to the peace conference which will convene here shortly with the purpose of ending the war in southeastern Europe, are now assembled in London. The Turkish envoys arrived late last night and unless the continuance of hostilities between the Turks and Greeks should prove a hindrance there seems nothing in sight to prevent the conference getting immediately down to business.

TRADE STILL BRISK.

Largest Retail Holiday Business Ever Known in America.

New York, Dec. 16.—Bradstreet's says:

Despite cross-currents in trade, reflecting the advance of the year toward its close, business as a whole is still active, and industry is so, in a high degree.

Jobbing trade reflects more and more the influence of holiday demand and orders from salesmen are smaller, while mail business is larger, especially in re-orders to fill broken stocks.

R. G. Dun and company's weekly review of trade says:

What appears to be the largest holiday retail trade ever known is in progress, this being a very practical test of the buying power of the people as a result of the agricultural and industrial prosperity, with labor everywhere fully employed. Indeed, the only limit to production in many lines is the limit fixed by the scarcity of labor.

Tugs Break Ice for Boats.

Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., Dec. 16.—Fifteen vessels loaded with grain bound for Buffalo, followed the two ice-breaking tugs Sabin and Schenck, down the St. Mary's river as the tugs made a pasage through the ice for the big ships. On the return trip four steamers followed in the wake of the tugs to the Soo. About a dozen vessels, both up and down bound, are expected to pass here before navigation has actually ended.

Montana Death Due to Shock.

Villisca, Iowa, Dec. 16.—Mrs. D. Peckham of Villisca, died in Bozeman, Mont., the ninth victim of the tragedy which shocked people here last June when J. B. Moore, his wife and four children and two visitors were butchered in their beds by an assassin to whose identity no clue has ever been found. Mrs. Peckham lived with her family, next door to the Moore home, and was the first to view the awful sight. She never recovered from the shock.

Misty Past.

"I am afraid," said Senator Sorghum, "that the altercation in which I have become involved must be more or less obscure to the casual listener."

"About all you have both said lately is 'You're another.'"

"Yes. And we have said it so often that I am afraid nobody remembers exactly what either of us was accused of being, in the first place."

WHAT PATTY DID

by CLAUDINE SISSON

(Copyright.)

AND it had come to pass that on this day before Christmas a man not old in years sat in his room at a hotel in a strange town and felt himself of all the world the most lonely. High and low, rich and poor, mingled in the procession of happy shoppers without. He alone had no thought for Santa Claus.

It went back five years. He, the son of a railroad magnate, had dared to fall in love with the blue-eyed daughter of a locomotive driver on his father's road—a man whose face and hands carried grime—who dwelt in a cottage—who had no society outside of daily toilers. And he had dared stand before the father who thought himself specially created and say:

"Father, I going to be married."

"Well?"

"To Gladys Davis."

"Never heard of her."

"The daughter of one of our engineers."

There was a moment of painful suspense and then the storm broke.

"You shall not! You are either a fool or a lunatic to think of it. An engineer's daughter! Think of your mother—of me—of your sister—the disgrace! You must have lost your senses!"

"But I am to marry her," was the steady reply.

"I say no! If the jade has trapped you into an engagement buy her off. The father must use his influence or take his discharge."

"But we love and are promised to each other."

In the next half hour the father stormed and cajoled. If the son insisted on such a marriage he would be cast out by the family; he would be ridiculed even by the common people. And the magnate ended up with:

"Fred, I will have the engineer called up here and give him a check for a thousand dollars and tell him that this nonsense must end."

"We shall be married three days from now," was his answer.

In reply to that the father pointed to the door, and the son bowed and passed out to be son no longer. He had money that had been left him by an aunt, and the father could not threaten him with poverty.

Love may always be right, but it can be so influenced as to be seemingly a mistake. The marriage took place and Fred Dillingham was ostracized. He was not kindly welcomed in the other stratum. If there is a gulf between the rich man and the workingman the latter resents intrusion as much as the former. There was love, but after a few months it was influenced from both sides. Both husband and wife were made to fear that a grave mistake had been made. They fought away the idea and sought to hold their love, but that brought irritations and vexations and culminated in misunderstandings and quarrels. After two years there was a separation. Neither really desired it. It was what the gossips had predicted, and what they strove to bring about.

There was more sorrow than anger when the young husband turned his back on wife and infant a year old and went out into the world as a wanderer. The wife went back to her father's cottage, but not to struggle with poverty. The husband been generous to her.

Five long years, and Fred Dillingham had not been heard of. As an outlaw without a family, whom should he write to and why? At three years of age the child, who had been named Patty, wondered in her childish way why she hadn't a papa. At five she demanded to know. At six she stood before the embarrassed mother in indignation and threatened to go out and find one.

And at last the wanderer had recrossed the sea and headed for his home. He was tired and weary and lonely. Home? But he had none! He had left it when he left wife and baby. This struck him like a sudden blow, though he had all along realized it in a general way. No home—no wife—no child! That was why he had left the train and taken lodgings. He had no place to go. With money in his pockets, he was a tramp.

And to know that Christmas was at hand, and to hear the jingle of sleigh-bells and catch the shouts of children on the street—to wonder if his child still lived, and to wonder further what old Santa Claus would bring her—why, the man cursed the fears he could not keep back.

A quarter of an hour later the outlaw was down on the street He would mingle with the throng. He would enter the stores under the evergreen branches and look about him—aye, make a purchase and be Santa Claus to some big-eyed child on the street. He was an outlaw, but the world should not crowd him quite to the edge. He was almost smiling as he crowded his way into a big store, and he was looking about him when a small, warm hand was cuddled into his and a child's voice said:

"Please take care of me 'till mamma finds me—I'm lost!"

It was a little girl, and on her face was both a smile and a look of entreaty.

"Why, of course," replied the outlaw, pressing her hand and drawing her back a little. "So you came here with your mother after Christmas things and got separated?"

"That's it, only I think she ran away from me so that I shouldn't know what Santa Claus was going to bring me tomorrow night."

"I hope it will be something nice."

"Oh, it will be. Are you buying something for your little girl?"

"N-o-o."

"Maybe she's dead?"

"I—I don't know."

The girl looked up and noticed the grave expression on the outlaw's face, and cuddled closer to him and said:

"I'm sorry if I have hurt you. Mamma says I talk too much. I've just thought that maybe you are not married at all?"

"I guess that's pretty near it," replied the outlaw as he tried to laugh, but made poor work of it.

"Well, if you haven't got any little girl I haven't got any papa. What you going to buy.

"Why, whatever you say?"

"But not for me?"

"Yes, for you. We'll select something, and then when your mother comes I'll ask her if she'll let you have it."

"I hope she will. You look to be such a nice man that she shouldn't refuse. I picked you out as the very nicest man that came along."

"Thank you," said the outlaw as he felt his heart grow big. "Now, then, about this doll. Real hair, eyes that wink, pink shoes and almost as big as you are. She'll be a sister to you."

"And how much is it?"

"Only ten dollars."

"My, but can you pay that much! If you can you must be rich."

"But you see I have no little girl of my own."

"That's so. Isn't Christmas nice? Do you know—there's mamma over there! Let me run and tell her."

The outlaw turned his back on the crowd and gritted his teeth and winked his eyes. He had been hit hard. Three or four minutes passed and then a hand pulled at his and a voice said:

"Please, Mister nice man, tell me your name, that I may introduce you to mamma. I think she will let me have the doll" The outlaw turned and gasped and his face went white.

"Gladys!"

"Fred."

"You here!"

"And you!"

"And this is our daughter?"

"Our Patty. Father was discharged from the road and moved over here to take another run."

It was the next day, and Patty was sitting on her father's knee and the happy mother was wiping tears from her eyes, when the child said:

"Say, mamma, I just picked him out as the very nicest man in all that big crowd, and I didn't make any mistake, did I? Don't anybody sit down on my doll and give her a pain!"

Made It Work.

A week before the Christmas ... days an undergraduate wished to start home, thus gaining a week's vacation on the other students. He had, however, used up all the absences from the lectures which are allowed, and any more without good excuse would have meant suspension. In a quandary he hit upon this solution; he telegraphed his father the following message:—

"Shall I come home at my leisure or straight home?"

The answer he received was: "Come straight home."

An exhibition of the telegram to the professors was sufficient.

An Assurance.

"Don't you think a holiday is more cheerful when there is a large family gathered about festive board?"

"I do," answered the sardonic person. "A large family is a glad assurance that there is not going to be enough turkey left to supply the menu for the next few days."

ECZEMA ALL OVER BODY

175 East St., San Francisco, Cal.—"I used the Cuticura Remedies while in business in San Francisco before the earthquake and fire. I was a terrible sufferer from eczema for several years. I had it all over my body except my hands, neck and face, my legs and arms being the worst. I had to put stockings on my hands at night to keep from scratching, and whenever I did scratch the parts burnt like fire. My limbs got so bad that from my ankles to my knees there wasn't a particle of skin on them, and the flesh itself turned perfectly blue and raw, continually throwing off a moisture, and I had to keep them wrapped in oiled silk cloth to keep my underclothes from sticking fast to my limbs.

"I tried all kinds of ointments, ——, ——, and a thousand others, and took all kinds of internal medicine, but with no relief. Then I bathed my body with Cuticura Soap and kept it anointed with Cuticura Ointment and my skin is now as smooth as a baby's. They cured me completely." (Signed) Harry A. Jones, Feb. 10, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

Where Autos Are Barred.

Prince Edward island bars automobiles, not because the islanders cannot afford the machines, but because of accidents caused by the recklessness of drivers who brought in the first cars. They caused many runaways, and a few had tragic endings. The legislature at once passed a law barring autos from the island. Some of the leading cities have since endeavored to have the enactment repealed, but the country influence has always been strong enough to overcome all such efforts.

Being a Diplomat.

"I am much bothered," he said. "I can marry a wealthy widow whom I don't love, or a poor girl that I do love intensely. What shall I do?"

"Listen to your heart," advised his companion, "and marry the one you love."

"You are right, my friend. I shall marry the girl."

"Then can you give me the widow's address?"—London Opinion.

The unexpected and unusual sometimes happens. At Springfield, Ill., a sleep walker fell from the fifth story of a hotel and was killed.

Kitty Morian, a London suffragette, will spend a month in jail rather than pay a fine. She seems to be some different from the American "kitty."

Governor Eberhart says we are going to have a united Republican party. Not while men of the Eberhart or Ed Smith type are running the machinery.

There is a movement on foot to change the Minnesota primary law so as to legalize the Progressive party. It is, of course, very strongly opposed by the machine republicans, while the democrats heartily favor the change.

President Taft has decided to accept the professorship of law at Yale when he retires from the presidency next March. There is no question but that he is well qualified for the position, and that he will give better satisfaction there than in the presidential chair.

The Housekeepers League of Philadelphia commenced a co-operative effort to reduce the cost of living. They started out on eggs with the result that the retail price of eggs dropped from about 50 cents per dozen to 24 cents, this for the cold storage variety. Both producers and consumers can accomplish a lot by intelligent co-operation.

In the impeachment proceedings against Judge Archbold, the fact that he was a boodler seems to have been pretty thoroughly established, but the defense is calling numerous witnesses to prove the defendant's good character. If his reputation had not been pretty fair, he would hardly have gotten the chance to make away with any boodle, or work any grafts in his position. It is usually the official who is considered safe from suspicion that can command the biggest price for a little crooked work.

Democrats in congress are pretty well worked up over the action of President Taft in placing all postmasters of the Fourth Class under civil service rules, and there is talk of having Presibent Wilson rescind the order. Is is all right that these officers should be in the civil service, and, instead of taking them out, congress should pass a law fixing a minimum salary limit that would in a measure compensate for their work and responsibility, Under the present system their renumeration is entirely idadequate for the service rendered.

Price Will Be Advanced

After January 1st, 1913, the subscription price of The Northern Light will be increased to $1.50 per year, payable in advance, and the paper will be regularly issued in 8-page size. Until December 31st subscriptions will be seceived at the present price of $1.00 in advance.

AWFUL SECRET OF MURDERER

Daniel Webster's Vivid Portrayal of the Tortures That Beset the Guilty Soul.

Meantime, the guilty soul cannot keep its own secret. It is false to itself, or rather it feels an irresistible impulse of conscience to be true to itself. It labors under its guilty possession, and knows not what to do with it. The human heart was not made for the residence of such an inhabitant. It finds itself preyed on by a torment, which it dares not acknowledge to God nor man. A vulture is devouring it, and it can ask no sympathy or assistance either from heaven or earth. The secret which the murderer possesses soon comes to possess him, and, like the evil spirits of which we read, it overcomes him and leads him whithersoever it will. He feels it beating at his heart, rising to his throat, and demanding disclosure. He thinks the whole world sees it in his face, reads it in his eyes, and almost hears the workings in the very silence of his thoughts. It has become his master. It betrays his discretion, it breaks down his courage, it conquers his prudence. When suspicions from without begin to embarrass him and the net of circumstance to entangle him, the fatal secret struggles with still greater violence to burst forth. It must be confessed, it will be confessed. There is no refuge from confession but suicide, and suicide is confession.—Daniel Webster.

GETTING CLOSE TO NATURE

Stretch Yourself Out Beneath an Oak and See If You Feel This Way.

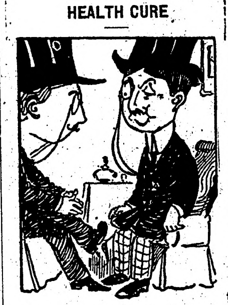
Whether its branches show green against a dark-blue sky—gold where the sunlight touches them—whether its leaves show magenta in the light of the setting sun, or black and silver in the moonlight, there is no tree of them all to compare with the oak. All a summer's day you may lie stretched beneath it, so strong and so friendly, not to you only, but to all the little lives that swarm about its roots. All kinds of busy creatures—ants, spiders, daddy-longlegs—beloved of your childhood go scurrying over you on this errand and that, as unafraid, almost, as if you were dead. A feeling of kinship comes to you: a knowledge that all this life about you is oak and grass and insect, and the good dog lying at your feet, is but a little part of the ageless flux and reflux; soothingly as a cool hand on an aching head there comes to you the realization that soon fears, hates and loves forgotten, your tired body shall rest under the trees all the days and all the nights.—Atlantic Monthly.

HIS GIRL WAS LOCKED OUT

Young New Yorker's Race With Moving Train Proves Interesting to the Passengers.

Indianapolis travelers, homeward bound from New York, saw an amusing incident recently on one of the big trains with transcontinental connections. About ten minutes before time for the train to leave the station a young man and a young woman came aboard. After depositing the various grips in the Pullman they went out on the back platform to say goodby. They were busily engaged in their own thoughts. Time for the train to get under way arrived. When the train started the young man prepared to get off, preferring to take the last few minutes with the girl, rather than escort her into the car. She turned a face suspiciously alive with tears toward the door. She tried the handle—and found that some industrious, zealous porter had locked her out. The young man discovered her dilemma as he swung off the train. With the train gathering speed momentarily he raced toward the front and succeeded in getting aboard long enough to make the porter understand that he had locked the girl out. When the porter opened the door and beckoned her in she still gazed back at retreating dear old New York and the immaculate young gentleman who, no doubt, had her heart in his keeping.

HEALTH CURE



Dickson—Doctor, what do you recommend as a Lenten diet?

Doctor—Cutting out everything except the tip to the waiter.

A PROTEST.

Sir: Rosebery, at Peebles last week, said: "George III. is supposed to have said that Shakespeare was 'sad stuff.' . . . I am inclined to think no one but a crowned sovereign on the throne would have had the courage to make it." I claim Rosebery's admiration (unless, as is quite possible, I have it already), for I have said far more startling things about Shakespeare than ever George III. had wit or pluck to say! I do not desire, on this occasion, to boast, and I therefore give only my initials as signature to this letter. But I inclose my card, and remain, yours, etc., G. B. S.—Punch.

WHY IT FAILED.

"Why did the elopement fall through?"

"We had a signal arranged. She told me to come to her window and make a noise like a robin. I did so."

"Yes?"

"Then her father popped out and made a noise like a shotgun."

THEY ALWAYS LIE ABOUT IT.

"How'd he get his black eye?"

"I think he bumped a door in the dark."

"Ha, ha! they all say that."

"I think that because he said a man punched him."

NOT THAT WAY.

"Your daughter dances with such graceful, free movements."

"No, sirree! Them dancin' movements of hers is all paid fer."

WARNING.

"Sir, may I have your daughter's hand?"

"Certainly, but be careful it isn't always in your pocket."

THEIR DRAWBACK.

"Why do writers make so much of transparent complexions?"

"I'm sure I don't know. Anybody can see through them."

MEAN HINT.

"Miss Maude is quite a scientific beauty."

"Yes; anyone can tell that by her hair."

SCALES TURNED TO GOLD.

Sicily has a new industry, that of raising artificial goldfish and selling them by the hundred thousands to other countries. Small fish are caught or bred and put into a basin pregnated with chalk and various iron preparations. These make the skin of the fish impervious. Next the fish are bathed in the gold making preparation, the composition of which is a secret of the manufacturers. The strong fish survive this test. The survivors take on a golden hue first in the neighborhood of the tail. Then follow other preparations and still others until the fish in the end is a regular goldfish such as people pay big money for.

WRONG BOY.

"Johnny," said the mother as she vigorously scrubbed the small boy's face with soap and water, "didn't I tell you never to blacken your face again? Here I've been scrubbing for half an hour and it won't come off."

"I—I—ouch!" sputtered the small boy; "I ain't your little boy. I—ouch! I'se Mose, de colored lady's little boy."—Ladies' Home Journal.

The Great American Circus! Greatest Ever---All Under One Tent

The following address to the "Filipinos" has been credited to several different persons. It contains a whole lot of truth together with its alliteration:

"You Filipinos dont know what you are missing by not wanting to become citizens of this grand country of ours. You ought to send a delegation over to see us—the Land of the free—Land of fine churches and 180,000 licensed Saloons; with Bibles, forts and guns; millionaires and paupers; theologians and thieves; libertists and liars; politicians and poverty; Christians and chain-gangs; schools and scalawags; trusts and tramps; money and misery; homes and hunger; virtue and vice; a Land where you can get a good Bible for fifteen cents and a bad drink of whisky for five cents; where we have a man in congress with three wives and a lot in the penitentiary for having two wives; where some men make sausage out of their wives and some want to eat them raw; where we can make bologna out of dogs, canned beef out of horses and sick cows, and corpses of the people who eat it; where we put a man in jail for not having the means of support and on the rock pile for asking for a job of work; where we license bawdy-houses and fine men for preaching Christ on the street-corners; where we have a congress of 400 men to make laws, and a Supreme court of nine men who sets them aside; where good whisky makes bad men and bad men make good whiskey; where newspapers are paid for suppressing the truth and made rich for telling and teaching a lie; where professors draw their convictions from the same place they get their salaries; where preachers are paid $25,000 a year to dodge the devil and tickle the ears of the wealthy; where business consists of getting hold of property in any way that won't land you in the penitentiary: where trusts hold-up and poverty holds-down; where white men vote for what they do not want for fear they won't get what they do want by voting for it; where niggers can vote and women can't; where we sit on the safety-valve and pull wide open the throttle of conscience; where gold is substance, the only thing sought for; where we pay $15,000 for a dog and fifteen cents a dozen to a poor women for making skirts; where we teach the untutored Indians eternal life from the Bible and kill them off with bad whisky; where we send a man to jail for stealing a loaf of bread and to congress for stealing a Railroad; where the check book talks, sin walks in broad daylight, Justice is asleep, crime runs amuck, corruption permeats our whole social and political fabric, and the devil laughs from every street corner.—Come to us, Fillies: We've got the greatest aggregation of good things and bad things, hot things and cold things, all sizes, varieties and colors ever exhibited under one tent. Where a girl who goes wrong is made an outcast, and her male partner flourishes as a gentleman; where women wear false hair and men dock their horse-tails; where the political wire-puller has displaced the patriotic statesman; where men vote for one thing one day and cuss it 364 days; where we have prayers on the floor of our national capital and whisky in the cellar; where we spend $560 to bury a statesman if he is rich and $10.00 to put away a working man who is poor—. Then why not join us in our glory."

WINE OF KIRK-KILISSEH.

Under its own name Kirk-Kilisseh, now figuring in the war news, conveys nothing to the majority of Englishmen, but incognito, so to speak, it is very well known indeed. For Kirk-Kilisseh is a place of vineyards, producing an excellent wine, which is eagerly purchased by French firms, shipped to Bordeaux and sold as the "best Bordeaux." And so it comes about that many smack lips over "Bordeaux" that is really Kirk-Kilisseh.

WILSON TO NAME CABINET IN MARCH

IN MEANTIME WILL LOOK OVER FIELD AND GET OPINIONS.

EXPECTS NO DIFFICULTY

Thinks Right Men Will Be Easily Found—Will See Bryan, Clark and Others During the Next Few Days.

Trenton, N. J. Dec. 23.—Whether William Jennings Bryan, or any of the other prominent Democrats being mentioned by politicians generally for places in the cabinet of President-elect Wilson, will be appointed to portfolios probably will not be known until a few days before inauguration day. Governor Wilson said that very likely he would not make an announcement of importance until about March 1.

To Confer with Leaders.

Within the next 24 hours he will talk with Mr. Bryan and before New Year's he expects to see Speaker Clark, Representative Underwood, Senators O'Gorman, Hoke Smith, Gore and other prominent Democratic leaders; but he indicated that he meant to keep strict silence about appointments until ready to make a general statement on the subject.

"Scattering announcements would be foolish," he said, "even if I had them to make. I'll wait until pretty late. The time will depend somewhat on the number of written communications received. All these letters recommending individuals for office are being grouped and will be taken up separately."

Mr. Wilson indicated that he would not feel at liberty to make final decision until the merits of all possible candidates had been set forth to him.

Wants All Opinions Possible.

"What I am sincerely trying to do, he added, "is to see the field of choice and to try to get as many opinions as possible that are worth while."

The president-elect likewise made it clear that though gossip may be heard far and wide, he would maintain a policy of silence and nothing would be definitely known until he made the announcements over his own signature.

Mr. Wilson was asked if he believed he would encounter any difficulty in getting the men desired for cabinet portfolios to accept. It had been suggested that in the case of the attorney generalship, noted lawyers often had been reluctant to leave their practice, and for this reason many able men were not pushed by their friends.

"That has not been my experience thus far," the governor replied with a smile. "I've asked some persons and they have been ready with their names."

Receives Campaign Report.

The governor received a call from Rolla Wells, treasurer of the national Democratic committee and former mayor of St. Louis, who brought a bound volume showing campaign contributions and expenditures, a facsimilie of which recently was filed with the clerk of the house of representatives.

The governor pointed with evident pride to the neat tabulations of expenditures and contributions with the thousands of names and items.

"I venture to say," he said, "that it's a better looking report than the other two fellows filed. It's the best conspectus of its kind I've ever seen and is an interesting document, because it's the first report under the law requiring the publicity of campaign contributions."

When the party left Fishkill they were acompanied by a score of enthusiastic suffragettes, and on their arrival here they were met by a large delegation with rousing cheers.

HOURS SPENT STUDYING LAW

PRESIDENT-ELECT IS WORKING HARD ON DUTIES.

Announces That He Will Confer With Bryan Saturday or Sunday.

Trenton, N. J., Dec. 21.—President-elect Wilson bored studiously for several hours here over the corporation laws of New Jersey, with a view to recommending radical changes in them to the legislature.

After he had worked most of the day in his capacity as governor, he listened to a formal appeal by United States Senator Lee Overman of North Carolina, that Josephus Daniels, national committeeman from that state for nearly 20 years, be appointed postmaster general in the Wilson cabinet. The presient-elect made no comment. He announced also that he would meet William Jennings Bryan for the first time since the election on Saturday or Sunday, either at Trenton or Princeton.

The governor's day was concentrated for the most part on the corporation question. Repeated charges were made during the national campaign by both Colonel Roosevelt and Governor Hiram Johnson that Mr. Wilson had failed to put into effect any legislation curbing trusts that were chartered as Jersey corporations. Though his opponents devoted many speeches to this argument. Mr. Wilson never made a speech of reply. One he telegraphed briefly to Senator O'Gorman of New York, however, an address which was made public, in which he declared that as the state legislature always had been Republican in one or both branches he had been unable to put through his promised program of reform. He added also that evils complained of, in connection with the trusts mostly concerned federal jurisdiction.

On National politics, the president-elect was most reticent. He had nothing to say about his approaching visit with Mr. Bryan and in recounting the events of the day passed quickly over the mention of cabinet appointments.

SAYS MONEY TRUST IS NOT POSSIBLE

ALL THE BANKS IN CHRISTENDOM COULD NOT FORM COMBINE SAYS J. P. MORGAN.

FAVORS COMBINATIONS.

Financier Disclaims Knowledge That He Wields Vast Power—Seeks No Such Position In Finance.

Washington, Dec. 21.—J. Pierpont Morgan told the money trust investigation committee of the house that "all the money in christendom and all the banks in christendom" could not form a monopoly. Mr. Morgan disclaimed any knowledge that he wielded a vast power in modern finance, and declared emphatically that he sought no such power.

For nearly five hours the chief witness, called by the committee in its probe of the intricacies of modern finance, stood a running fire of questions that covered every phase of financial operation.

Remarkable Hearing.

In some respects it was one of the most remarkable hearings about the halls of congress in recent years, with Mr. Morgan as the type and embodiment of financial operations on a colossal scale, and the committee's counsel. Samuel Untermyer, the representative element which seeks to probe to the innermost recesses the conditions under which vast financial operations are conducted.

Prefers "Combination."

Mr. Morgan gave at length his views on competition, combination cooperation and control in industry and finance, particularly the latter. He declared that he "did not mind competition," but that he preferred "combination" in his operations. He was emphatic in his declaration that "there is no way one man can get a monopoly of money."

Throughout the long examination to which Mr. Morgan submitted with an evident willingness to answer, there was not a moment when interest lagged. Short, sharp questions and answers came with striking rapidity.

While the colloquys were at times emphatic there was no serious clash between Mr. Morgan and Mr. Untermyer.

Mr. Morgan gave a ready response to questions, although there was often a battle of wits as to the meaning and effect of various financial conditions and operations.

The question of competition and combination brought about a lively interchange between the noted financier and Mr. Untermyer, the latter opening the tilt with the suggestion that Mr. Morgan was opposed to competition.

The witness denied this, but said that he "favored co-operation," adding that he was in no way opposed to competition and in fact "liked a little competition."

Disagrees With Untermyer.

He disagreed with the views of Mr. Untermyer on the question of interlocking directorates, which forms the basis for a large part of the statistical evidence that makes up the record of the money trust investigation up to date. Without actual control, Mr. Morgan claimed, there is no control, although some directors may be common to several corporations.

SUES HARVESTER TRUST.

Claimed Companies in Alleged Combine Advertised as Independent Companies.

Chicago, Dec. 21. — Testimony by one manufacturer of harvesting machinery that representatives of the International Harvester company had sought to lure away his customers by false statements was given in the hearing here in the government's suit to dissolve the International company as an illegal combination. Copies of advertisements by companies alleged to have been absorbed in the Harvester company, but who proclaimed themselves as "independents" were introduced in evidence by government counsel.

The testimony that his customers had been taken from him by misrepresentations was given by A. J. Glass, manager of the Adriance-Platt company of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Mr. Platt said that agents of the Harvester company had told his customers that the Adriance-Platt company had been absorbed by the Harvester company and that they might as well order from headquarters.

London, Dec. 21.—The memorial service for the late Ambassador Whitelaw Reid, celebrated in Westminster Abbey, was an impressive ceremony. SCALES ON BABY'S HEAD

510 East Washington St., Portland, Ore.—"When my brother was one month old a layer of scales or scabs began to form on the top of his head. The trouble began as a rash. The scales increased until several layers thick. The crust was thick and yellow and looked to be all in one piece, but came off in large scales. His hair came out in bunches and baby became almost bald. His scalp itched and burned so badly as to make him cross and fretful.

"We used every remedy recommended by our friends without success. Then we started with the sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment, washing his head good with the Cuticura Soap and then applying the Cuticura Ointment. Before they were used up we could see an improvement in his condition and bought some more. The scales loosened and came off easily. In about two months after we started to use Cuticura Soap and Ointment the scales had entirely disappeared and his hair started to come in thickly. Cuticura Soap and Ointment effected a complete cure." (Signed) Miss Ella Ehrlich, Mar. 11, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

A young girl, over her queer alligator pear salad, mentioned the name of a Princeton sophomore who had played rather badly on his class team.

"He is an awfully nice boy," she said. "What was it he played on the eleven, Mr. Baker—halfback, quarterback, fullback?"

The handsome and herculean "Hobey" smiled.

"I think he played drawback," he said.

Baking Made Almost Automatic

Science has done many wonderful things in the way of lightening kitchen-work, but possibly the most welcome of its many achievements is the prepartion of a baking powder that makes baking almost automatic.

This wonderful baking powder is known as Calumet Baking Powder.

As you perhaps know from your own experience—baking is largely a matter of "luck." If your baking powder happens to be just right, your baking will be good. But if it varies in quality or in strength—as so many baking powders do, your bakings are more than likely to be ruined.

Calumet Baking Powder puts a stop to the dependence on "luck." With it, all quickly-raised foods can be made without the slightest trouble—made pure and wholesome and tasty. For Calumet itself is pure in the can and in the baking—and so uniform in quality, so carefully prepared, that failures are impossible. You can judge of its purity, too, when you know that it has been given the highest awards at two World's Pure Food Expositions—one at Chicago in 1907 and the other at Paris, France, last March. Adv.

CANADA WEEK IN CHICAGO

CANADIAN EXHIBITS AT LIVE STOCK AND LAND SHOWS CENTER OF ATTRACTION.

The hats were doffed to Canada during the two weeks of the Land Show and the week of the Live Stock Show at Chicago. Willing to display its goods, anxious to let the people of the central states know what could be produced on Canadian farm lands, and the quality of the article, Hon. Dr. Roche, minister of the interior of Canada, directed that sufficient space be secured at the United States Land Show, recently held, to give some adequate idea of the field resources of western Canada. Those in charge had splendid location, and installed one of the most attractive grain and grass exhibits ever seen anywhere. Thousands, anxious to get "back to the land," saw the exhibit, saw wheat that weighed 68 pounds to the measured bushel, oats that went 48 and barley that tipped the scales at 55 pounds. The clover, the alfalfa, the wild pea vine and vetch, the rye grass, the red-top and many other succulent and nutritious varieties of wild grasses demanded and deserved from their prominence and quality the attention they received. The grain in the straw, bright in color, and carrying heads that gave evidence of the truth of the statements of Mr. W. J. White of Ottawa, and his attendants, that the wheat would average 28 to 35 bushels and over per acre, the oats 55 to 105 bushels, the flax 12 to 28 bushels, were strongly in evidence, and arranged with artistic taste on the walls. The vegetable exhibit was a surprise to the visitors. Potatoes, turnips, cabbage—in fact, all of it proved that not only in grains was western Canada prominent, but in vegetables it could successfully compete with the world.

One of the unique and successful features of the exhibit was the successful and systematic daily distribution of bread made from Canadian flour. It was a treat to those who got it. Canadian butter, Canadian cheese and Canadian honey helped to complete an exhibit that revealed in a splendid way the great resources of a country in which so many Americans have made their home.

A feature of the exhibit was the placards, announcing the several recent successes of Canadian farm produce and live stock in strong competition with exhibits from other countries. There was posted the Leager Wheeler championship prize for Marquis wheat grown at Rosthern in 1911, beating the world. Then I. Holmes of Cardston entered the competitive field at Lethbridge Dry Farming Congress, and won the wheat championship of 1912, beating Mr Wheeler with the same variety of wheat. Hill & Sons of Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, in 1911 won the Colorado silver trophy for best oats grown, competed for in a big competition at Columbus, Ohio, in 1911. The produce of British Columbia at the New York Land Show in 1911 carried off the world's championship for potatoes, and incidentally won a $1,000 silver trophy, and then, but a few days ago, the same province carried off the world's prize for apples at the Horticultural Show in London, England.

But that was not all. These Canadians, who had the temerity to state that corn was not the only feed for finishing high-grade beef cattle, entered for the fat steer championship at the Live Stock Show in Chicago a polled Angus—"Glencarnock Victor." Nearly 300 entries were in the field. "Glencarnock Victor" didn't know a kernel of corn from a Brazilian walnut. There were Iowa, Illinois, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Wisconsin and their corn-fed article, determined to win, bound to beat this black animal from the north, and his "nothing but prairie grass, oats and barley feed," as his owner proudly stated, but they didn't. Canada and McGregor & Sons, with their "Glencarnock Victor," won, and today the swelldom of America is eating of his steaks and roasts —the champion steer of the world.

But once more the herd of cattle that won the Sweepstakes at the same show was bred and owned by the owners of "Glencarnock Victor," fed only on prairie grass, oats and barley, near Brandon, Manitoba. The royal reception given to Mr. McGregor on his return to his home town was well deserved.

Omission must not be made of the wonderful and beautiful display of apples made by British Columbia, occupying a full half section of the great Land Show. This was in personal charge of Mr. W. E. Scott, deputy minister of agriculture for that province, who was not only a host to those who visited the exhibit, but was also an encyclopedia of information regarding the resources of that country. With 200,000 Americans going to western Canada this year, it is pleasing to know that so many from this side of the line can participate in the honors coming to that new country.—Advertisement.

EBERHART WELCOMED.

Celebration at Mankato in Honor of His Second Election as Chief Executive.

Mankato.—Governor A. O. Eberhart was given a rousing welcome by the residents of Mankato Thursday evening on his second homecoming after being elected Governor of Minnesota. Hundreds shook his hand as he stood in the receiving line at the Saulpaugh hotel, and 200 persons sat down at a banquet in his honor.

People came from St. Peter and other near-by towns. Democrats mingled with Republicans, and there was a good sprinkling of Bull Moose. Regardless of politacl affiliation, should honor to a citizen of Mankato.

The Governor and staff arrived from St. Paul at 3 P. M., and an impromptu reception was held at the depot. The formal reception took place between 7 and 8:30 o'clock.

Benjamin Taylor was toastmaster at the banquet, held in the dining room, which was decorated with flags and flowers. Among the speakers were C. E. Wise, editor of the Mankato Daily Review, a Democratic newspaper. He said that every one in the city, regardless of political affiliation, should be proud to know the Governor.

The Bull Moose had its inning when F. F. Ellsworth, who at the Progressive meeting in St. Paul, proposed a third state ticket, rose to welcome home Governor Eberhert. He proposed a rising toast to the guest and was cheered roundly.

Joseph H. Beek of St. Paul, secretary of the Association of Commerce, reviewed the services of Governor Eberhart to the state. He mentioned the state Conservation congress and said the National Conservation congress was brought to Minnesota largely by his efforts.

When the Governor rose to speak he was greeted with cheers. He spoke feelingly, saying the reception made him happy in the thought that his own people were satisfied with his record in office. He launched into several timely subjects, referring to the troubles in Oregon over the capital punishment law.

"I still maintain that capital punishment is an outrage," he said. "Never once since the law was abolished in Minnesota has a sheriff or police official told me it has increased the tendency to crime."

C. H. Biorn of St. Paul and L. C. Hunt of Seattle, formerly a Mankato editor, also spoke.

Waseca Board Sustained.

Waseca.—Judge Childress has made a decision in favor of the water and light board in the case of the W. J. Armstrong Company versus the City of Waseca. The action was one in mandamus and was brought by Mr. Armstrong, the relator, to compel the board to furnish power to run and operate three motors which he recently installed in his bottling works. The board offered to furnish sufficient power to operate the bottling works if Armstrong would install a one-phase motor. It refused to furnish electric power to run the three-phase motor for the reason that it would be necessary to install an extra meter and two transformers and incur other expense. Judge Childress held that the board need not furnish power for the three-phase motors and discharged the writ of mandamus.

Woman Saves Her Babies.

Moorhead.—Heroic action on the part of Mrs. William Sherill, of Moorhead, saved her two babies from burning to death in a fire which destroyed their home. Mrs. Sherill was visiting a neighbor while her husband and two children slept in the house. The husband was awakened by the flames and smoke, and believing the children to be with their mother, rushed from the burning home. The mother, returning home, rescued the older child and was severely burned. She returned for the other baby, however, and was overcome. A neighbor who had followed her into the building dragged her to safety, also saving the baby.

Contest Over Judgeship.

Wabasha.—The election contest case over the judgeship in Wabash county came before Judge Snow in district court. Walter A. Munger, present judge, defeated by James E. McCloud, of Wabasha last month by 172 majority, is the complainant. He contends that the names of the two candiates in the non-partisan contest were not rotated on the ballots as required by law, and that as a consequence, he was defeated. McCloud's name appeared first throughout.

PRODUCE SHOWS GAIN.

Increase of 318,825,864 Bushels Due to Better Farming Rather Than Acreage Increase.

Minneapolis.—Farmers of Minnesota took 318,825,864 bushels of grain out of the soil this year and far exceeded last year's production of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley and flaxseed, and H. J. Maxfield, commissioner of immigration, who has issued an annual summary, said therein that good farming, and bigger yields per acre, and not increased acreages did the business.

From these crops the farmers got value equal to $135,310,095, Mr. Maxfield figured, but this does not represent all the crop valuation of the state. His report is confined to the six principal grain crops.

His report shows that in 1912, Minnesota produced 55,272,285 bushels of wheat, against 43,935,000 in 1911, a gain of 11,337,285 bushels. This year the oats crop was 142,488,793 bushels, against 67,214,000 bushels the preceding year, or a gain of 75,274,793 bushels. The corn yield this year was 99,144,499 bushels, against 74,140,000 in 1911, a gain of 25,004,499 bushels. The barley yield for 1912 was 49,828,281 bushels, as against 28,025,000 the preceding year, or a gain of 21,803,281 bushels. This year's rye crop was 7,958,640 bushels, against 4,488,000 bushels in 1911, or a gain of 3,470,640 bushels. The flax crop for 1912 was 4,163,366 bushels, against 3,200,000 bushels in 1911, a gain of 963,366 bushels.

The figures were gathered by special crop reporters in each county and the acreages were based upon a careful estimate of the percentage of increase or decrease, compared with the census figures for each county in 1909. The average yield per acre is an estimate, by each crop reporter, based upon reports received from different sections of his respective county.

Mayor Vetoes Resolution.

Owatonna.—The break between the mayor and members of the city council was widened when Mayor Nelson vetoed the council's resolution to approve the paving job recently completed in Owatonna. The contractors, Fielding & Sheply, of St. Paul, were to pay a penalty after a certain period had elapsed, and the city has a goodly sum due it. The council voted to waive its right, and to give the contractors the full amount. Mayor Nelson insists that the amount of the penalty must be paid. It requires the vote of five of the seven aldermen to pass the resolution over his veto.

Masonic Rally at Owatonna.

Owatonna.—A noteworthy event in Masonic circles was the conclave held in Owatonna of the joint commanderies of the Owatonna, Austin, Faribault and Albert Lea Knights Templar. The red cross degree was conferred by the Owatonna lodge, after which a banquet was served by the women of the Universalist church. Grand Prelate Pinkham, of St. Paul, and Grand Commander Snow, of Wadena, assisted in conferring the degrees. The total deposits in the banks of this county, seven in number, aggregate $3,000,000. A new bank has recently been opened at Medford.

House Bespattered With Paint.

Marshall.—The farm house of Hans Lavesson, living near Lake Benton, was bespattered with black paint, the mixture being applied with a squirt gun, which was found in the pasture of John Hanson. Hearing an unusual noise outside, Mr. Lavesson arose and saw the outline of a man using the squirt gun. Mr. Lavesson secured a revolver and went out on the front porch, whereupon, the man with the paint ran. The vandal was not found.

Flesh Saved Her From Death.

East Grand Forks.—Because she is so fleshy, Miss Lucy Borcher of this city is alive today. She became unconscious while bathing and two hours later her father, failing to get an answer to summons, broke the bathroom door and found her lying unconscious in the tub, which was half filled with water. Her body was wedged against the sides of the bath tub, preventing her head from going under the water. A gas burner had consumed the supply of oxygen.

U. S. RAIDS $10,000,000 MILL

SIX NEW YORK STOCK PROMOTERS ARE ACCUSED.

Raid Conducted by Postoffice Inspectors at Offices of Sterling Debenture Co.

New York, Dec. 23.—On a federal indictment charging fraudulent use of the mails in promoting stock for a mill where linen was supposed to be made in a day, six men were arrested in a raid conducted by postoffice inspectors at the offices of the Sterling Debenture company here.

The authorities estimate that the yearly income of the promoters in this and other ventures has been more than $1,000,000 and that nearly $10,000,000 of the public's money has been paid over to them since they began doing business.

Investors in many parts of the country are named in the indictment as complaining witnesses and the alleged unlawful conspiracy specified extended over a period of 19 months, ending Dec. 31, 1909. Government authorities here have been investigating complaints against the defendants for six years, they say.

The men arrested are Frank W. Shumaker, former president of the Sterling Debenture company, and Harry H. Platt, Samuel E. Findlay, Edwin A. Barron, Wilbur M. Stone and Sidney Rosenbaum.

They were held in bail aggregating $32,500. Three other men are named in the indictment. One of them, according to news received last night, has been arrested in Chicago. The others are believed to be in Brookfield, Mass.

According to the indictment, investors were induced to send money to the Sterling Debenture company for the purchase of stock in the Oxford Linen Mills, a Maine corporation, under the fraudulent representation that the Oxford mills owned, exclusively, patent and secret processes that would manufacture linen from American grown flax at one-third the cost of foreign linen, and in quicker time.

According to the postal authorities, the Oxford Linen Mills are not now connected with the Sterling Debenture company, having broken away from any affiliation with that concern.

One Arrest in Chicago.

Chicago.—George N. Middlebrooks, former president of the Sterling Debenture company of New York, was arrested here on a charge of using the mails to defraud.

Arrest at North Brookfield.

Brookfield.—Frank C. Winchell, former president of the Oxford Linen mills, was arrested at North Brookfield by Federal Inspector Charles A. Bancroft.

Wisconsin Instructor Exonerated.

Madison, Wis., Dec. 23.—An instructor in the University of Wisconsin, who was discharged with misconduct in having required a woman student to remove her coat in a class room and appear clad only in a gymnasium suit, which she wore on account of having been summoned suddenly to a recitation, was exonerated by a committee of the board of regents.

U. S. Sues Southern Pacific.

Los Angeles, Cal., Dec 23. — The complaint in the long-expected suit of the federal government against the Southern Pacific railroad, involving title to $250,000,000 worth of supposed mineral bearing lands in Fresno county, was filed here in the United States district court for the southern district of California. Other suits are to follow in which the government will contest the ownership of a total of $750,000,000 worth of lands, according to B. D. Townsend.

160 ACRE FARMS IN WESTERN CANADA FREE

For years the Province of Alberta (Western Canada) was the Big Ranching Country. Many of these ranches today are immense grain fields and the cattle have given place to the cultivation of wheat, oats, barley and flax; the change has made many thousands of Americans, settled on these plains, wealthy, but it has increased the price of live stock.

There is splendid opportunity now to get a

FAMOUS SHRINE OF MEXICO

Cathedral of Our Lady of Guadalupe and Well That Heals the Sick.

The village of Guadalupe, Mexico, contains the most famous shrine on this continent. It is dedicated to Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Over the altar in the cathedral is a painting held to be of miraculous origin. This is the sacred tilma or apron of the peasant, and on this tradition says appeared over 300 years ago an image of the Virgin.

The Indians today come from the remote quarters of Mexico to worship at this shrine and to carry home bottles of water from a near-by well which is said to possess healing qualities. The walls of the church are covered with votive offerings, pictures, etc., given by those who have been cured or benefited.

In the picture the Virgin is shown dressed in a bluish pink gown, and not long ago the women of Mexico gave a jeweled crown to hang over this picture. When Hidalgo struck the first note for Mexico's independence he carried a picture of Our Lady of Guadalupe on his banner, and the first engine that entered Mexico had a picture of this patron saint painted on the cab.

WAYS OF THE HONEY BIRD

It Leads Hunters to Bee Trees in Order to Obtain Its Favorite Diet.

In his "Journal of the Sporting Nomad" Mr. Studley gives an extraordinary account of the honey bird, advancing the theory that this strange little animal has consciously entered into a mutual benefit partnership with men. The honey bird attracts the attention of the hunters by a chattering sound and leads them direct to a hollow tree, wherein bees have swarmed, this being done, says the author, with the direct expectation of reward. "Cooe rewarded the bird by crumpling up some of the comb that had the young bees in it, then, scratching a little earth aside with his assegai, placed the broken comb there, lightly re-covering with earth. On many subsequent occasions I have followed these birds. All my boys were honey gluttons, especially Cooe; they evidently preferred the comb with the young bees within it, for they stuffed their mouths full of it—another proof that there is no accounting for taste.

"With reference to this bird, there is no sort of doubt that they deliberately call the wayfarer's attention by chattering. I have tried them by persistently ignoring their summons, sometimes owing to my not having time to follow it up, or to see what the bird would do in such a case. I found that they will track you for some time, but give it up as a bad business if you do not shortly take any notice of them.

"I take it that from time immemorial the natives have appreciated their feathered allies by leaving some of the comb as a reward, the birds being unable to obtain their favorite diet without human assistance. The trick has therefore almost become an hereditary instinct."

"Neither have I. What make of car did you buy?"

Philadelphia City Hall Employee Therefore Declared Charges of Incompetency Couldn't Be Proved.

When called before one of the city hall departmental directors a short time ago with a demand for his resignation an employee insisted that he be given a specific bill of particulars that would warrant him complying with the request. "You are incompetent," said the director. "Are you sure of that?" asked the employee. "Positive proof," said the director. "Where did you get your information?" insisted the employee. The director declined to reveal the source of his information which formed the basis of the charges of incompetency. There was some parrying, and the employee threatened to demand that detail charges be preferred. Finally the employee signed his name to the form of resignation which was placed before him. "You are a wonder," he said, "if you can prove me incompetent, for I have not done a tap of work for the last six months during which I have drawn my pay; you haven't had a chance to prove whether I am competent or incompetent."—Philadelphia Record.

TEMPTED TO WITTICISM.

Pedestrians in Broadway, in the neighborhood of Canal street, saw a sign in the doorway of a loft building the other day that brought a smile to their faces and then gave them an opportunity to exercise their sense of humor. A manufacturer who wanted to engage the services of several new employees had hung out this placard: "Wanted, young girls to learn work on feathers." Without doubt ninety-nine persons out of every hundred who noticed the sign remarked, "There is a chance for anyone looking for a soft job."—New York Tribune.

EXPLAINED.

"What is it?"

"Such as what?"

Carried Off by Pneumonia

Vincent L. Backe, age 14 days, died of pneumonia at 10 minutes before 12 o'clock on Tuesday night. He had suffered from a severe cold for several days but his condition was not considered serious until just a few hours before the end. He was the first born and only child of Mr. and Mrs. B. L. Backe, and the first great sorrow of their lives has fallen where the presence of their baby made life's pathway most bright and fair. The sincere sympathy of the entire community is with the young parents in their sorrow.

The funeral occurs at 1 o'clock today and the interment will be in the local cemetery.

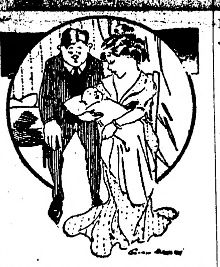
Y. P. S. Elected Officers

The annual meeting of the Young Peoples Society was held at T. O. Dovre's place last Friday evening and officers elected for the ensuing year are as follows:

President—C. A. Yvon.
Vice-press—Alfred Anderson,
Secretary—Selma Dovre,
Cashier—B. L. Backe,
Program committee—Lydia Bjerk, Clarence Kolden, Hjalmer Peterson.

The main topic discussed was ways and means of raising money to build a basement under the church and fit it up for the use of the society. This work is to be undertaken during the coming year, and the Society cordially invites a liberal attendance at their future meetings.

SURE THING



Mrs. Newpop—See how perfectly still baby is. I wonder what he is thinking about?

Mr. Newpop—Probably what to cry about next.

"TO THE BITTER END."

The derivation of the often-used phrase, "to the bitter end," is explained by a writer in the New York Sun as follows:

It is a nautical term. If you have ever been on a big ship you must have noticed two large pieces of timber sticking up out of the deck forward, alongside each other. They sometimes have a windlass between them, and they are used to secure the anchor cable. These pieces of wood are called the "bitts."

When the ship comes to anchor and the cable is paid out all that part of it which is abaft, or behind, the "bitts" is called the "bitter end of the cable." In a storm, or in poor holding ground for the anchors the more cable that is paid out the better the anchor will hold, and when the captain is at all doubtful he pays out his cable to the "bitter end" sooner than risk any harm to his ship.

THE REGULAR THING.

"What does Tanks want to do with that thirst of his?"

"I rather think he wants to be treated for it."

38 DYNAMITERS ARE FOUND GUILTY

JURY DECIDES THAT ALL EXCEPT TWO OF 40 DEFENDANTS MUST SERVE SENTENCE.

GOVERNMENT SUSTAINED

Verdict Upholds U. S. in Charging Nation-wide Plot—Seiffert and Buckley Discharged.

Indianapolis, Ind., Dec. 30.—Thirty-eight of the 40 defendants in the dynamiting conspiracy trial have been found guilty.

The two freed by the jury, which returned a verdict after being out many hours, are Herman Seifert of Milwaukee and Fred Buckley of Buffalo. The men found guilty include Frank Ryan, president of the Iron Workers' union, and many other high officials of that organization.

Dramatic Scene in Court.

The scene just before the appointed time for the court's convening was intensely dramatic. Easily the most picturesque defendant, both because of his prominence as a labor leader on the Pacific coast and because of his studious habits, Olaf A. Tveitmoe, San Francisco, sat in the very middle of the courtroom, his hat in one hand and his cane in the other.

Tveitmoe had been known as the literary personage of the trial because of his persistent readings of poetry during the testimony about dynamite plots. Ryan, the head of a union of 12,000 members, sat in the last row of the defendants' seats, having changed his position from a point near a table once occupied by Senator J. W. Kern, his counsel. In front of him was located J. E. Munsey, Salt Lake City, accused by the government of having assisted in the escape of James B. McNamara while the latter was fleeing from the scene of the Los Angeles explosion.

Confronting all those in court, high above the judge's desk and illuminated by the soft glow of electric lights, hung a huge allegorical painting, representing "Justice," which the defendants had looked upon as week after week they heard stories of violence, assaults, riots and dynamiting related from the witness stand.

List of Guilty.

The following were found guilty:

Charles N. Beum, Minneapolis.
Frank M. Ryan, president of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers.
John T. Butler, Buffalo, vice president.
Herbert S. Hockin, former secretary and formerly of Detroit.
Olaf A. Tveitmoe, San Francisco, secretary of the California Building Trades council.
Eugene A. Clancy, San Francisco.
Philip A. Cooley, New Orleans.
Michael J. Young, Boston.
Frank J. Higgins, Boston.
J. E. Munsey, Salt Lake City.
Frank C. Webb, New York.
Patrick F. Farrell, New York.
John H. Barry, St. Louis.
Paul J. Morrin, St. Louis.
Paul W. Legleitner, Denver.
William E. Reddin, Milwaukee.
Michael J. Cunnan, Philadelphia.
Richard H. Houlihan, Chicago.
James Cooney, Chicago.
James H. Coughlin, Chicago.
William Shupe, Chicago.
Edward Smythe, Peoria, Ill.
James L. Fennell, Springfield, Ill.
James E. Ray, Peoria, Ill.
William C. Bernhardt, Cincinnati.
Wilford Bert Brown, Kansas City, Mo.
William J. McCain, Kansas City, Mo.
Frank K. Painter, Omaha.
Peter J. Smith, Cleveland.
George Anderson, Cleveland.
Michael J. Hannon, Scranton, Pa.
Edward E. Phillips, Syracuse, N. Y.
Charles Wachtmeiser, Detroit, Mich.
Frank J. Murphy, Detroit, Mich.
Fred J. Mooney, Duluth.
Ernest G. W. Basey, Indianapolis.
Fred Sherman, Indianapolis.
Hiram R. Kline, Muncie, Ind., former organizer for the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners.

Sentences Set for Monday.

The jury was discharged and court adjourned until today when sentences will be imposed.

Possible punishments vary from any minimum to a maximum of thirty-nine and one-half years, in the direction of the court.

Each prisoner found guilty stands convicted of having in one instance joined a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United State government, this being punishable by two years' imprisonment or a fine of $10,000, or both.

Each prisoner also is found guilty of twenty-five charges of illegal transportation of explosives on interstate passenger trains, each offense being punishable by an imprisonment of eighteen months or a fine of $2,000, or both.

While the possible punishments are thirty-nine and one-half years, the court intimated in the course of the trial he would impose sentence in accordance with the degree of guilt.

Stand By Beum.

Minneapolis, Dec. 30.—Labor leaders in Minneapolis stand by Charles Beum, notwithstanding his conviction by a federal jury in the dynamite case at Indianapolis. They declare that his position as secretary and business manager for the Building Trades council will be kept open for him.

Revision Warning Issued.

Washington, Dec. 30.—"Prepare for the worst. Revision downward soon will be an accomplished fact." This, in substance, is a letter, copies of which have been sent to manufacturers and others desiring protection, by Senator Penrose, chairman, and members of the senate finance committee. It is the conviction of Penrose and his friends that the Underwood bills of the sixty-second congress, with the exception of the free sugar bill, will be passed as they passed the present house.

WOMEN ARE DUE AT ALBANY

WOMEN WITH BRASS BAND MEET MARCHING SUFFRAGETTES.

Will Rest Over Sunday and See Governor-elect Sulzer On Monday.

Niverville, N. Y., Dec. 30.—After a 14-mile walk from Stockport in a driving snow storm, General Rosalie Jones and her marching suffragettes who are bearing a message to Governor-elect Sulzer at Albany decided to push on in the dark for another three miles from Pine Tree Inn to Niverville. There it was decided to return to the inn for the night and the commissary car took them back. This morning they were driven to Niverville and from there took up their walk again, hoping to cover the remaining twelve miles into Albany by early afternoon.

The weather was very trying to the five marching pilgrims changing yesterday morning from rain to a heavy snow. The roads for many miles were a foot deep with slush and snow.

The pilgrims stopped for luncheon at Kinderhook. While there General Jones announced that the army would finish its march into Albany today.

Fifty women enthusiasts with a brass band will meet the tired little army today at East Greenbush and escort them the remaining three miles into Albany. Sunday will be spent in resting and it is probable an audience with Governor-elect Sulzer will be obtained Monday.

The pilgrims plan to attend the inauguration ball New Year's eve.

SCHOONER IS ABLAZE.

Man Declares He Saw Boat Ablaze Off Block Island—Cutter to Rescue.

Newport, R. I., Dec. 30.—Following the receipt of a wireless report that an unknown schooner was afire at sea, 12 miles southeast of Block Island, without possibility of receiving assistance, from life saving stations, owing to the heavy gale and high seas that prevailed, the revenue cutter Seneca was dispatched from New London, Conn., to the rescue.

Word was also sent to the cutter Acushnet, at Woods Hole, Mass., and she is expected to go to the scene.

The report came from the New Shoreham life saving station on Block Island. The message said a resident of the island, Warren Ball, had seen what he thought was a schooner afire 12 miles southeast of the island. Owing to the distance and the thick weather he could not make an accurate observation but thought the vessel was a three or four-master.

Sea and weather conditions are reported to be such that help from the life savers is out of the question.

Villisca, Ia., Dec. 30.—Lew Van Alstine, a Taylor county farmer, has been arrested by City Marshall Horton on a warrant charging him with the murder of the Moore family and the Stillinger girls on the night of June 9 last. Minot, N. D., Dec. 30—Miss Daisy M. Taylor, aged 22, a sister, and John Day, a nephew, both of Edwards, N. Y., will participate with Mrs. J. D. Taylor, widow of Dr. J. D. Taylor of this city, in the distribution of his estate which, under a will drawn in the St. Paul hospital last October, was bequeathed in its entirety to his wife. Dr. Taylor left an estate of about $100,000 and a contest had been started in an effort to break the will on the grounds that he had been mentally incompetent.

VIRGINIANS GREET PRESIDENT-ELECT

ALL TURN OUT TO WELCOME HOMECOMING OF NATIVE SON.

SHAKES SEVERAL HANDS.

Wilson Spends Night in the Room Where He Was Born 56 Years Ago—Mrs. Wilson Along.

Staunton, W. Va., Dec. 30.—Virginia welcomed home Governor Woodrow Wilson, the eighth of her native sons to be chosen president of the United States. From the moment the president-elect crossed the state line at Alexandria in the afternoon after he had a ten-minute glimpse of the national capital, until he reached the little parsonage here where he was born just 56 years ago, the reception given him was one of great enthusiasm, noisy demonstration and spectacular display.

Troops Escort Him.

Escorted by troops of cavalry, militia companies and a torchlight procession in which practically the whole town participated, the governor and Mrs. Wilson motored through the streets of Staunton to the home of Rev. Dr. A. N. Fraser, pastor now of the Presbyterian church where the Rev. Jos. N. Wilson, father of the president-elect, lived in 1856.

With Mrs. Wilson, the president-elect paused for a minute on the illuminated portico of the house and greeted Dr. Fraser. The band struck up "Dixie," the governor turned and waved his hat to the crowd and a spontaneous shout of welcome echoed in the winter air.

"It's fine to be back again," exclaimed the president-elect as he stepped indoors. Suffering still from the effect of his cold, he retired immediately to the room in which he was born to rest for the morrow when the chief program of the jubilee will be carried out.

Gay Scenes Outside.

Outside the crowds hurried from the streets which were alive with colors and flags and electrical display. From far and wide, native children of Staunton had come to greet their fellow townsman. Except for an informal visit a year ago, Mr. Wilson had not been here since he was three years old. Staunton was not alone in celebrating the arrival in Virginia of the distinguished visitor. Bonfires blazed the way, fireworks shot across the skies and red lights threw a festive glare at all stations along the route, though the train glidded by most of them without stopping.

Mrs. Wilson stood with her husband on the rear platform of the train and enjoyed the demonstrations, too.

Harry Smith, Jr., and Speaker R. E. Bird of the house of delegates, both of them classmates of Governor Wilson at the University of Virginia law school, greeted the president-elect here. He thanked them warmly for their efforts in his behalf in the preparations for his welcome.

Philippine Independence.

Staunton, Va.—President-elect Wilson favors a provisional government for the Philippines for eight years and independence thereafter, according to representative William A. Jones of Virginia, chairman of the house insular affairs committee, who discussed the Philippine situation with him on the train.

The president-elect announced merely that he had talked with Mr. Jones "about the general situation in the Philippines." Asked particularly if he had talked about the bill being pressed by Representatives Jones in congress, proposing a provisional government for eight years and independence afterward, Mr. Wilson replied:

"Oh, we talked about that at Sea Girt last summer."

Representative Jones, however, had no hesitancy in saying that Governor Wilson already had heartily endorsed to him the pending bill.

SHIP ASHORE; CREW SAFE

Men Aboard the Savannah Had Climbed Into Rigging to Escape the Sea.

Wilmington, N. C., Dec. 30.—Captain Gould and his crew of eight men were rescued from the schooner Savannah which ran ashore on Frying Pan shoals in a heavy gale. Life savers from the Cape Fear and Oak Island stations took the men off.

The 496-ton lumber laden vessel was bound for northern ports from Jacksonville. When the life savers reached Frying Pan shoals, Captain Gould and the members of the crew had taken refuge in the rigging of the schooner and had suffered from cold and exposure. It is believed the schooner will be lost.

Fanatics Half Starve Indian.

LaCrosse, Wis., Dec. 30.—Because he refused to adopt the creed of the "Mystic Beau," a new and strange religious sect, just discovered among the Wisconsin Winnebago Indians, John Blackcrow was bound to a tree near Lytle, five miles north of here, and had he not been found by Game Warden Ed. Gautsch of La Crosse, would have died of cold and starvation. His condition is serious. Blackcrow had been bound to the tree two days before being found.

BLAME PLACED ON PHYSICIANS

Growth of Drug Habit in United States Alleged to Be Due to Opiates Ordered in Prescriptions.

That 99 per cent. of all the cocaine and morphine manufactured in this country is used by persons who have formed the drug habit through physicians' prescriptions is the startling statement made by Dr. L. F. Kebler, Chief of the Division of Drugs, Department of Agriculture. This statement, and others, proving that physicians and not "patent" medicines are responsible for the appalling growth of drug addiction in the United States was made by Dr. Kebler in an address at Washington, before the American Society for the Study of Alcohol and Narcotics.

Dr. Kebler is quoted by Washington papers as having declared that drug using had increased 100 per cent. in the last 40 years, and that American medical men were not discriminating enough in their use of opiates. Their overindulgence to their patients, he said, is creating thousands of drug users every year.

"It is a very sad thing to say that our physicians are doing the greatest work in promoting the use of cocaine and morphine," said the doctor. "State laws are not saving the public from the grip of the drug habit, and the American public is sinking tighter and tighter into the black abyss of the morphine and cocaine fiend.

"The worst of it is that the importation of opium into the country is becoming larger and larger year by year. I have heard it said on reliable authority that 99 per cent. of the cocaine and morphine manufactured in this country is used by persons who have formed the habit through doctors' prescriptions."

Almost simultaneously with Dr. Kebler's address, Dr. J. A. Patterson, at Grand Rapids, Michigan, in a public statement said that 19 out of every 20 patients who come to an institution with which he is connected for treatment for the drug habit owe their downfall to physicians' prescriptions.

PREPARING FOR NEW SETTLERS

EXTENDING THE AGRICULTURAL AREA IN WESTERN CANADA.

For sometime past the Canadian government has had surveyors at work platting new areas for the accommodation of the largely increasing number of settlers coming in to occupy the agricultural districts of the three prairie provinces. There were those connected with the work of securing settlers for western Canada who last spring prophesied that there would be as many as 175,000 new settlers from the United States to Canada during the present year, and there were those who doubted that the previous year's figures of 132,000 could be increased. Recent computation made by the officials of the immigration branch at Ottawa show that the largest estimates made by officials will be beaten and that the 200,000 mark from the United States will be reached. As great an increase will be shown in the figures of those who will reach Canada from other countries this year. The results of the year's work in Canadian immigration will give upward of a total of 400,000 souls.

But this is not to be wondered at when it is realized what is offering in the three prairie provinces and also in the coast province of British Columbia, which is also bidding strongly and successfully, too, for a certain class of settler, the settler who wishes to go into mixed farming or fruit raising. When the central portion of this province is opened up by the railway now being constructed there will be large areas of splendid land available for the settler.

Reference has frequently been made of late by those interested in developing the American west to the large numbers who are going to Canada, high officials in some of the railways being amongst the number to give voice to the fact. The more these facts become known the more will people seek the reasons and these are best given when one reads what prominent people say of it. What the farmer thinks of it and what his friends say of it. James A. Flaherty, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus, was in western Canada a short time ago. He says:

"If I were a young man I would sell out my interests in less than two months and come right to the Canadian Northwest, where so many opportunities abound."—Advertisement.

RINGWORM COVERED ARMS

2073 Ogden St., Denver, Colo.—"About four years ago I was bothered dreadfully with ringworm around my mouth. I did not pay much attention to it at first, although it looked bad. It spread rapidly and itched and burned dreadfully. The first thing I knew my arms from the elbows down were covered with ringworm, and my face seemed worse. I got some medicine which relieved the itching and sort of dried up the ringworm, but it kept coming back. I decided to let the medicine go, and I scratched them until they were sore. At that time there must have been four on my face. One extended from the corner of my mouth under my chin. That was the largest one, but the smaller ones looked as bad for they were kept fiery red from my scratching. Each of these red blotches was raised about one sixteenth of an inch, and the centers were covered with pieces of dried skin giving them a very rough appearance.

"One day I accidentally got hold of a small piece of Cuticura Soap, and in a few days I noticed how much good it was doing me. I kept on using the Soap, and spoke of it to a friend of mine. She told me of the Cuticura Ointment, and by using both, the ringworm disappeared in a short time." (Signed) Miss Helen Magee, June 11, 1911.

EBERHART WELCOMED.

Celebration at Mankato in Honor of His Second Election as Chief Executive.

Mankato.—Governor A. O. Eberhart was given a rousing welcome by the residents of Mankato Thursday evening on his second homecoming after being elected Governor of Minnesota. Hundreds shook his hand as he stood in the receiving line at the Saulpaugh hotel, and 200 persons sat down at a banquet in his honor.

People came from St. Peter and other near-by towns. Democrats mingled with Republicans, and there was a good sprinkling of Bull Moose. Regardless of politacl affiliation, should honor to a citizen of Mankato.

The Governor and staff arrived from St. Paul at 3 P. M., and an impromptu reception was held at the depot. The formal reception took place between 7 and 8:30 o'clock.

Benjamin Taylor was toastmaster at the banquet, held in the dining room, which was decorated with flags and flowers. Among the speakers were C. E. Wise, editor of the Mankato Daily Review, a Democratic newspaper. He said that every one in the city, regardless of political affiliation, should be proud to know the Governor.

The Bull Moose had its inning when F. F. Ellsworth, who at the Progressive meeting in St. Paul, proposed a third state ticket, rose to welcome home Governor Eberhert. He proposed a rising toast to the guest and was cheered roundly.

Joseph H. Beek of St. Paul, secretary of the Association of Commerce, reviewed the services of Governor Eberhart to the state. He mentioned the state Conservation congress and said the National Conservation congress was brought to Minnesota largely by his efforts.

When the Governor rose to speak he was greeted with cheers. He spoke feelingly, saying the reception made him happy in the thought that his own people were satisfied with his record in office. He launched into several timely subjects, referring to the troubles in Oregon over the capital punishment law.

"I still maintain that capital punishment is an outrage," he said. "Never once since the law was abolished in Minnesota has a sheriff or police official told me it has increased the tendency to crime."

C. H. Biorn of St. Paul and L. C. Hunt of Seattle, formerly a Mankato editor, also spoke.

CHRISTMAS OUTDOORS.

Five Thousand Children From City and Surrounding Country Witness Spectacle.

Albert Lea.—Practically five thousand of the school children of Albert Lea and the surrounding country were given Christmas presents by the business men's association here. The event was conducted in the open air, a monster Christmas tree having been erected on a prominent Broadway street corner, and decorated with tinsel, ornaments and hundreds of electric lights of various colors. A display of colored fireworks added to the attractions.

That, it is asserted, is the first public open air Christmas tree celebration ever held in the United States, and the enthusiasm and Christmas spirit it awakened has assured its continuance in Albert Lea for future Christmases. A part of the plan of the Business Men's association is to keep the huge tree decorated and brightly lighted throughout the entire holiday season, which it is expected will add materially to the evening crowds of shoppers.

Ore Roads Order Equipment.

Duluth.—The Duluth, Missabe & Northern and the Duluth & Iron Range roads are about to order much equipment for delivery next spring. The former road plans to buy 1,000 steel ore cars and three passenger locomotives, and the latter 1,000 steel cars, six freight locomotives and three passenger locomotives. The ore cars will be of the standard drop bottom type and of 100,000 pounds or fifty net tons capacity each. Early placing of orders is necessary, as the car and locomotive works of the country have orders for months ahead.

$100 Pearl in Oyster.

Albert Lea.—A few days ago the A. A. Baker family of this city killed a chicken and found in its gizzard a $50 diamond. Now comes Len Grobel, a traveling salesman of this place, with a fine pearl taken from a raw oyster he was about to eat. The pearl is as big as a good-sized pea and is said to be worth $100.

Duluth Lumberman Sued.

Chicago.—The inside information to the organization of the lumber trust is expected to be developed in a suit filed in the municipal court by Donald MacMillan, a La Salle street broker against Wirth Cook, a lumberman of Duluth, Minn. Sidelights on the Lorimer scandal also may be brought into the case. Through his attorneys, Mr. MacMillan claims a commission of $35,000 for bringing about the sale of 6,180 shares in the Virginia & Rainy Lake company.

LAWS TO BE URGED.

Executive's Message to Advise Bill to Regulate Stock Issues, Also.

St. Paul.—Governor A. O. Eberhart has announced that in his message to the 1913 legislature he will recommend the following measures:

The creation of a state land department to be supervised by a commissioner of the public domain.

The creation of a department of agriculture to co-operate with the state college of agriculture in disseminating information among the farmers of the state.

Congressional and legislative reapportionment.

Presidential preference primaries.

The creation of a state public utilities commission to have supervision over all public utility corporations not now under the supervision of the state railroad and warehouse commission.

A law which will enable the state to control the issuance and sale of all stocks, bonds or other securities, this law designed to prevent the sale of "blue sky" securities.

A workingmen's compensation and employers' liability act.

Stricter regulation of woman and child labor.

The extension of agricultural and industrial training in the schools of the state and the establishment of social centers.

The improvement of state highways.

Reform in judicial procedure and legislation uniform with that adopted in other states on marriage, divorce and other subjects.

Measures designed to prevent crime by removing the causes.

More stringent public health measures and increased vigor in the fight against tuberculosis.

Laws encouraging publicity and development work for the state.

Governor Eberhart, in making public an outline of his message, said that the message would be shorter than the usual message, that he would deal only with general subjects and new projects, using a synopsis from the reports of different department heads in telling the legislature of the condition of the state departments.

One of the features of the report will be the governor's recommendation that the state take a hand in preventing the sale of questionable stock and securities. The governor believes a law can be passed which will prevent the sale of stocks and securities of companies which have no financial backing. Such a bill has been prepared by Insurance Commissioner J. A. O. Preus of Minnesota and H. L. Ekern, insurance commissioner of Wisconsin, and will be introduced in the legislature by Senator Carl L. Wallace.

In discussing the prevention of crime the governor will not approve the proposed mothers' pension law. He said today that he was not convinced that the passage of a mothers' pension law is advisable, but that he believed steps might be taken in removing the causes of conditions which lead to the demand for a mothers' pension.

DIES AT HIGH MASS.

Mrs. Mary A. Laderoute Passes Away While Sunday Service Is Going On.

Minneapolis.—While solemn high mass was being said in Holy Rosary church, Mrs. Mary A. Laderoute quietly closed her eyes in the last sleep. Several hundred school children, there for communion, filed slowly down the aisle past her inanimate form, not knowing she was dead.

Even the officiating priest was not aware that a member of his congregation had gone from the sound of his voice. When those near her finally realized what had happened the word was passed to the altar. She had been dead for several minutes.

Fair Association Elects.

Cambridge.—At the annual meeting of the Isanti County Fair association the following directors were elected: J. A. Stoneburg, D. O. Anderson, A. W. Ericson, E. F. Gillespie, W. H. Dunbar, J. E. Kienetz, W. H. Smith, C. Nordfeldt and G. G. Goodwin. The directors selected the following officers: President, J. A. Stoneburg; vice president, A. W. Erickson; secretary, W. H. Dunbar; treasurer, E. F. Gillespie. It was voted to try and dispose of the forty-acre tract two miles out of town and buy more suitable grounds near the town. It was also voted to dispose of the balance of the stock for the purpose of improvements.

Burnquist Makes Statement.

St. Paul.—Lieutenant Governor-elect J. A. A. Burnquist, of St. Paul, has issued a statement concerning the proposal to take the committee appointive power in the senate away from the lieutenant governor and place it in the hands of a committee on committees. Mr. Burnquist declares that if the state senators deprive him of the power to name committees the responsibility must rest with them and them alone. He says that the people elected him to the office with the understanding that he would appoint the committees.

Northfield Wants Road.

Northfield. — The Northfield [illegible] association is making an effort to have the model road, which is to be constructed by appropriations from the state and Federal government built between this city and St. Paul. The offer of the Federal government, which has been made to states throughout the Union, provides for an appropriation of $10,000 and the services of its good roads engineers to construct a model road fifty miles long, providing the state contributes $20,000.

Backache Makes Anyone Feel Old

Nothing ages anyone more quickly than weak kidneys.

It is not alone the aching back, the stiff, painful joints, but the evil effect of bad, poisoned blood on the nerves, the vital organs and the digestion.

The condition of the kidneys makes good health or ill-health.

The kidneys are the filters of the blood. Active kidneys filter from the blood every day over one ounce of poisonous waste and pass it off dissolved in the urine.

If the kidneys are weak or diseased, only part of this filtering is done and the blood is heavy with uric acid and other poisonous or waste matter.

Instead of being nourished by the blood, the nerves and vital organs are irritated, and the circulation, digestion, etc., are disturbed.

If your back aches constantly, if your joints are stiff, lame and painful, suspect the kidneys.

Kidney sufferers are likely to feel dull, heavy, restless at night, rheumatic, dizzy at times, subject to headaches and annoyed with sharp, piercing pains that make work an agony and rest impossible.

Doan's Kidney Pills are the best-recommended and most widely used remedy for weak or diseased kidneys. They act quickly; contain no poisonous nor habit-forming drugs and leave no bad after-affects of any kind—just make you feel better all over.

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

The following case is typical of the cures effected by Doan's Kidney Pills. Grateful testimony is the best evidence.

SAVED HIS LIFE.

Made Well After Doctors Gave Up Hope.

E. D. Wert, Port Aransas, Texas, says: "The secretions from my kidneys were too frequent in passage, burned terribly and contained a thick, red brick-dust sediment. My back ached all the time and there were pains through my kidneys and sides. I simply couldn't straighten after stooping. When in bed, I couldn't even turn on my side. I had awful dizzy and nervous spells and my eyes got so bad that I couldn't use them much. I was confined to my bed for months. Finally, my own doctor called in a specialist for consultation. They told me I had but a short time to live. I happened to read of a similar case that had been cured by Doan's Kidney Pills. I sent for this remedy at once and from the time I began using it, I felt better and stronger. In two months I was able to work every day, and in another month I was as well as ever. For twelve years I have had no sign of kidney trouble."

WAS DRIVEN BY STARVATION

Jonsmith's Method of Getting Key Was Rather Extravagant, but What Could He Do?

His wife had been spending a week or two at the seaside with her own people, and Jonsmith had been living the lone and simple life. But there was a curious look of calm desperation in his eyes when his wife came back.

And presently the wife began to make discoveries.

"Where is——" she began. "Goodness! What have you done with my dresses? And what has happened to the lawn? What's that black patch in the center? Why——"

Jonsmith took a deep breath, then spoke bravely and manfully.

"Julia," said he—"Julia, I starved for two days, and then you wrote to say that the key of the pantry was in the pocket of your second-best, tailor-made walking skirt—not the bolero or the morning——"

"I said morning-skirt, and not the tailor-made, nor the——"

"It doesn't matter," Jonsmith interrupted wearily, and yet with a touch of savagery in his voice. "I don't know a tailor-made from a morning-skirt nor a bolero from a fichu. So I just took the whole lot out on the lawn and burnt them. Then I found the key whilst raking among the ashes!"

Looking After His Bait.

Daniel and Harvey, two old, expert fishermen, were "still" fishing for trout in deep water, sitting with their backs together, when Daniel accidentally fell out of the boat and went down. Harvey looked back and missed his companion, who at that moment appeared on the surface, pipe still in his mouth, shaking his whiskers profusely.

Harvey—Gosh, Dan! I jest missed ye! Where ye been?

Dan—Oh, I jes' went down for ter see if me bait wus all right.—Judge.

Wanted Slaves for Missouri.

On January 27, 1778, Don Bernardo de Galvez, governor of the Spanish province of Louisiana, which included Missouri, petitioned the king of Spain for aid for the settlers along the Missouri river and Mississippi river in Missouri. "The said inhabitants," he wrote, "in order to promote the culture of these plants (flax and hemp), would desire that the compassion of the king should design to provide them with negro slaves on credit, for whom they may pay with the crops aforesaid."

STEADY HAND.

A Surgeon's Hand Should Be the Firmest of All.

"For fifteen years I have suffered from insomnia, indigestion and nervousness as a result of coffee drinking," said a surgeon the other day. (Tea is equally injurious because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee).

"The dyspepsia became so bad that I had to limit myself to one cup at breakfast. Even this caused me to lose my food soon after I ate it.

"All the attendant symptoms of indigestion, such as heart burn, palpitation, water brash, wakefulness or disturbed sleep, bad taste in the mouth, nervousness, etc., were present to such a degree as to incapacitate me for my practice as a surgeon.

"The result of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum was simply marvelous. The change was wrought forthwith, my hand steadied and my normal condition of health was restored." Name given upon request. Read the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavor is always uniform. Sold by grocers—50-cup tin 30 cts., 100-cup tin 50 cts.

OFTEN THE CASE.

Evelyn—Did you have a good time at Miss Fussy's party?

Loraine—No; Mrs. Fussy worked so hard trying to make her guests feel at ease that she made everybody uncomfortable.

Eager for His Rights.

As little Freddie had reached the mature age of three, and was about to discard petticoats for manly raiment in the form of knickerbockers, his mother determined to make the occasion a memorable one. The Bristol Times tells what happened.

The breakfast table was laden with good fare as the newly-breeched infant was led into the room. "Ah," cried the proud mother, "now you are a little man!"

The fledgling was in ecstasies. Displaying his garments to their full advantage, he edged closer to his mother, and whispered, "Mummie, can I call pa Bill now?"—Youth's Companion.

Still Untasted.

"What," asked Mrs. Oldcastle as she picked up a volume of Limp Feather Edition of the Classics, "do you think of Thucydides?"

"I really don't know," replied Mrs. Gottalotte, after she had straightened a corner of her $600 royal Persian rug; "we've never had any. Josiah says they're no good unless you get them fresh, and our grocer never seems to have any except the ones in cans."—Exchange.

NEW DISTRICTS have recently been opened up for settlement, and into these railroads are now being built. The day will soon come when there will be no Free Homesteading land left.
A Swift Current, Saskatchewan, farmer writes: "I came on my homestead, March 1906, with about $1,000 worth of horses and machinery, and just $35 in cash. Today I have 100 acres of wheat, 300 acres of oats, and 50 acres of flax." Not bad for six years, but only an instance of what may be done in Western Canada in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or Alberta.

James J. Hill is talked of as a possible choice for the appointment by President Wilson as Secretary of Agriculture. There is no doubt but that Mr. Hill is capable of filling the office in a manner to benefit the country and reflect great credit on the new president, but we hardly think that he will accept any appointive office, as it might curtail his usefulness elsewhere.

The corporation papers brand the Iowa distance tariff law as a failure because it has a tendency to limit competition on intrastate business. They point out this weakness, but fail to give the aforesaid law the credit it is entitled to for making Iowa one of the richest states in the union and placing its farm land values nearer what they ought to be than almost any other means conld accomplish.

The government scored a signal victory against lawlessness when it secured the conviction of thirty-eight of the dynamite conspirators out of the forty indicted and tried in the federal court at Cincinnatta. Of those convicted thirty-three have been given terms in the federal prison. It is not impossible that the sentences imposed may be set aside on technical grounds, but the people have had their eyes opened to the enormity of the crimes commited in the name of organized labor. It is a real pleasure to think that the rank and file of the labor classes are opposed to dynamite regulation, and the crime of the conspirators is double in that they have greatly wronged innocent families of non-union men and the great army of union men to an appaling degree.

WANTED, A HERO

Joe Barton, surfman No. 6, was nearing the inlet end of his patrol. It was past eleven, and another hour would find him tumbling into his warm bed at the life-saving station. The night was clear and dark, with a light westerly breeze, and the surf broke on the inlet bar with a hushed, sleepy sound. In spite of the fine weather Joe sent dutiful glances seaward at frequent intervals; one never knows. But his thoughts were running busily upon concerns of his own, especially upon one recent and painful experience.

"Wish I could quit thinking about Elsa Robinson! Little Miss High-an'-Mighty—acts like she was a duchess and near about owned the beach!" he mused bitterly. "Just because I'm sort of new in the service and haven't been out to any bad wrecks she twits me with being only a show life saver. 'You boys look nice in the moving pictures,' says she, 'but you'd better wait till you've had some experience before you ask me again to marry you. I don't want nothing but a real hero,' says she, turning up her cute little chin. Wish I had spunk enough to keep from ever speaking to her again, but—" He sighed, and gave a longing glance toward a little cottage, where the piquant lassie who had captured his heart lived alone with her father, a small contractor in the employ of the land company.

Leaving the edge of the settlement behind him, Joe visited the lonely point of sand and beach grass where the key-post stood, wound his clock and started briskly on the return journey, whistling with growing cheerfulness as he thought of his bed and the coffee pot on the back of the station stove, for the late autumn air was chilly. As he repassed the Robinson cottage he looked, and sighed again from force of habit; but he sniffed inquiringly. At a front window an uncertain gleam of reddish light had caught his eye, though it flickered and disappeared so quickly that he almost doubted its existence. "I certainly do smell smoke, though," he muttered; "and there's the light again, for sure. Funny, too, for it was all dark when I went past before, and Elsa said that she and her father were going ashore today to stay overnight. Wonder if they've changed their plans, or maybe theyve left a fire in the stove and something's gone wrong!"

Joe was running toward the house at full speed, his sense of duty on the alert, for fire as well as water may call the government life saver into action. The shutters were open, and, looking in at a front window, he discovered that the glare shone through an open doorway inside. He ran to the rear, and a glance through the kitchen window showed that the room was aflame and that there was little chance of saving the house unless active measures were taken at once. He must find out whether the house was empty before rousing the neighbors and his mates at the more distant station.

"Can't be there's anyone here," he reflected, pausing to listen. But hark! As the flames shot higher, suggesting a new invasion of the stairway and upper floor he heard a feeble sound, like a gasping cry for help. Running to the front, he listened again. Yes, there could be no doubt of it. Some one was in the front bedroom and the stairs were on fire.

There was but one thing to do, and Barton did it without a moment's hesitation. With a sailor's quickness and skill, he climbed one of the columns of the porch, ran over the roof and broke in a window. A gush of strangling smoke halted him for a moment, and a burst of flame within, fanned by the fresh air, warned him that there was no time to lose. He dropped in at the window, groped his way to a bed in the corner and dragged out the limp and senseless form of a girl, in bathrobe and slippers, as though she had tried to escape before the smoke overpowered her. On the floor lay an old man, also partly dressed and unconscious. How he got them both out on the roof and down to the ground Joe never knew, but he somehow accomplished it, and, dragging them to a safe distance, ran to summon help.

He had not far to go, for the blaze, now roaring skyward, had given its own alarm, and men were gathering from all directions, among them the members of the life-saving crew. Joe went to work with the rest, while some women among the later arrivals used their skill to revive and cheer the unfortunate owners. They were soon able to sit up and watch the damage to their property, though the best efforts of all the men of the little settlement saved it from total destruction.

After it was all over and the crowd began to gather around them to proffer sympathy James Robinson spoke briefly. "Thank you, friends," he said huskily; "you've all worked like heroes and Elsa and I appreciate it. Now I'd like to see the fellow who got us out of there; I want to thank him for it." His voice trembled and he stopped, as Joe, unwillingly, smoke-stained and weary, was laughingly captured and pushed to the fore. Robinson shook his hand with deep feeling and then led his daughter forward. "There, Elsa," he exclaimed, "you're always talkin' about heroes; here's your chance to look at a real one!"

Elsa, now more conventionally clothed, but flushed and disheveled, glanced shyly at him in painful embarrassment. Joe's steady blue eyes returned her gaze quietly while he waited his chance to slip away into the darkness.

Suddenly, with a little sound, half sob, half laugh, she ran to him and threw her arms about his neck, heedless of the smiling crowd. "Oh, Joe, forgive me for teasing you so, dear! I knew you were brave and true all the time," she whispered. Then she lifted her head from his shoulder and smiled back proudly at the sympathetic townsfolk. "Joe," she added aloud, "this would be a good time to announce our — engagement, wouldn't it?"—New York Press.

MAKING A NATIONAL PARK

Persistency and Energy of One Man Saved Crater Lake Region to Country.

One morning in the spring of 1866 a thirteen-year-old boy arrived at a school house in Kansas after a five-mile walk across the prairie. At noon, after eating his lunch, he picked up the crumpled newspaper in which the lunch had been wrapped and in this read what purported to be a description of a wonderful "sunken lake" in Oregon.

It was a sensational, largely imaginative, inaccurate account, but it took such a strong hold on this boy, Will G. Steel, that two years later he arrived in Oregon in quest of this lake. It was not until after nine years of questioning, however, that he at last met a man who had actually seen Crater lake.

In 1885 he himself stood for the first time upon its wild and romantic shore. Before leaving it he resolved to have it made a national park. For years he spent money, time and energy to accomplish this; he went to Washington again and again. In 1902 he triumphed, and the Crater lake region became a national park.

Mr. Steel has had an important place in the forest conservation movement in the northwest from its beginning, and he commenced this agitation in 1886. For a short time in Portland, Ore., he published a little magazine called Steel Points. He is the author of a book, "The Mountains of Oregon," long out of print. It was he who, on the top of Mount Hood, on July 19, 1894, organized the Mazamas, the now famous mountain club of the northwest. Mr. Steel was born in Ohio in 1854 and is now living in Portland.—Country Life in America.

Homestead Will Keep Land

J. M. Bishop, attorney representing Ernest Sefkow, of Middle River, whose homestead in section 29, 159-41, was contested last fall, received an opinion from the Crookston land office las Tuesday overruling the contestant's allegation.

Ben Fronek brought the action against Sefkow last fall claiming that the homesteader had never established a legal residence on his claim. The testimony was taken before U. S. Commissioner Wilhelm Michelet in this city the latter part of October. Witnesses for the contestee, among whom was Anton Homolka, one of Sefkow's neighbors, testified that the defendant to the action had lived on the land, planted and harvested crops and otherwise conformed to the law's requirements. A transcript of the evidence was sent to the Crookston land office which has returned the above opinion.—Thief River Falls News-Press.

PRISONER MADE $300 A DAY

Paris Banker Conducts Extensive Financial Transactions From His Cell.

The Paris police recently raided a financial establishment in the rue Lafitte and confiscated the contents of the safe as well as the books, thereby putting a stop to the lucrative source of revenue of a banker named Zucco, who has been in prison for several months for irregular financial transactions.

M. Zucca, although ocupying a cell, first at the Sante and then at Fresnes, contrived to open another financial establishment in the same house as that occupied by his bank, which was closed by the police when he was arrested.

From his cell he directed a scheme for getting small investors to subscribe jointly for lottery bonds.

Business went well. The new establishment was soon employing ten clerks, and M. Zucco in his cell was making about $300 a day. But disappointed clients informed the police.—New York Tribune.

FAST PACE OF BUSY TOWN

Time Passes in an Incredible Manner and Nobody Ever Has Spare Minute.

A young boy eloquently dilating on the delights of the small town in which he lived, the baseball games, fishing, drives, picnics, etc., was interrupted by his listener, who asked curiously:

"But what do you do with yourself in the evening in a place of that sort, where there are no theaters or amusements of any kind?"

"Why," answered the youth, "I stand around in the drug store on the corner talking to a lot of fellows, and, all of a sudden, I ask 'What time is it?' And what do you think? It's twelve o'clock! Time passes just like that. Never saw anything like it. Gone before you know it. Nobody ever has a spare minute."

TARIFF DISCUSSIONS

FIRST MOVE IN DOWNWARD REVISION PROMISED BY THE PARTY.

TO AMEND PAYNE BILL.

Leaders Will Take Care Not to Do Injury to Industries, However —Extra Session About March 15.

Washington, Jan. 7.—The first stage in the program for downward revision of the tariff, promised by the Democratic party, was entered upon when the house of representatives, through its committee on ways and means, formally opened the doors to the American public for the discussion of tariffs, protection to industries and the "ultimate consumer."

First Change Since 1909.

The work is preparatory to the first change of tariff duties since 1909, when the Payne-Aldrich law was enacted by a Republican congress and approved by a Republican president.

Fortified by the election of a Democratic president and congress, the adoption of a tariff reduction plank at the Baltimore convention, and the pronouncement of President-elect Wilson that tariff revision is to be the first achievement of the new administration, Democratic leaders opened hearings confident that they will lead to an early change in many, if not all, of the schedules of the existing law.

Extra Session Date.

Urged by Democratic Leader Underwood, Speaker Clark and other Democrats, President-elect Wilson is expected to set the date of the convening of the extra session about March 15. It is expected that the details of many of the bills will be perfected by that time.

While the Democratic tariff is to be based on the revenue needed to run the government, it fully is understood that the probable results upon important American industries will be taken into consideration in reducing any of the present protective tariff rates. Approximately one-third of the government's income, about $330,000,000 is received from the tariff, but in many of the schedules the Democratic plans for reduction in rates would result in an increase of revenues because of the increase in imports that would follow.

Subject of Opening Hearing.

Drugs, chemicals, paints and other merchandise that come within the chemical list, known as Schedule A, are the subjects of the opening hearings.

An important factor in the preparations for the work on revision is the belief of Democratic leaders that before the extra session is called enough states will have ratified the income tax to enable congress to pass an income tax law, supplanting both the present corporation tax and the proposed excise law. Such an income tax, the Democrats estimate, would supply from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000 of the government revenue.

TEN LOSE THEIR LIVES.

Three Coasting Launches Driven on California Shore During Terrific Storm.

San Diego, Cal., Jan. 7. — Three coasting launches were driven ashore on the lower California coast near Point of Rocks, about 15 miles south of this city, and 10 men probably were drowned. One of the wrecked boats was the United States immigration launch Elizabeth. There was a total of 12 men on board the three vessels. Two are known to have reached shore.

Among the lost are United States Immigration Inspectors George Jones and Daniel Kirkendahl. One unidentified body is the only one that has come ashore.

The three vessels met disaster in one of the severest storms recently experiencd on th southrn California coast. Th gale at times reached a velocity of 60 miles an hour.

Washington, Jan. 6. — A brilliant assemblage, including the entire diplomatic corps, crowded the White House for the farewell diplomatic reception of the Taft administration. President Taft and Mrs. Taft, the members of the cabinet and their wives, stood in the receiving line in the Blue room as the diplomats, garbed in the gaily decorated uniforms of their courts, filed through to shake hands with the entire line. The guests then flowed into the big east room, the ball room of the White House.

PROBABLY FREED THIS WEEK

BANK BOND APPLICATIONS SENT TO LABOR OFFICIALS.

Bail Said to Have Been Raised Principally Among Labor Unions.

Indianapolis, Jan. 7.—As an immediate step toward procuring bail for the 32 members of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, now in the federal prison at Leavenworth, Kan., J. E. McClory, acting secretary-treasurer of the union, has gone to Leavenworth, taking with him blank bond applications.

McClory did not discuss his plans other than to say that he was taking blanks to the prisoners for their signatures. McClory intimated, however, that practically sufficient money or securities had been pledged to obtain the release of all the prisoners except Herbert S. Hockin, who has announced that he will make no appeal.

The funds have been raised principally among labor unions and it is believed that the imprisoned iron workers will be released during the week. The announcement by United States Distirct Attorney Miller that he would make no fight on indemnified bonds or securities located outside of this state, provided they were satisfactory in other respects, has simplified the matter for the defendant's attorneys and they hope to have the necessary $1,070,000, or its equivalent, for the release of all the prisoners by the middle of the week, at the latest.

The time required in getting the bonds signed and approved by Federal Judge A. R. Anderson who heard the trial, probably will delay freedom to the men until the end of the week.

Procedure Condemned.

Chicago.—Resolutions passed by the Chicago Federation of Labor condemned the entire procedure by which 33 labor leaders were convicted in Indianapolis of participation in a nation-wide "dynamiting conspiracy." Federal Judge Albert B. Anderson, the government agents and the jury were included in the sweeping condemnation, which the conservative element in the organization vainly opposed.

The resolutions did not go through without a fight. Edwin R. Wright, president of the Illinois State Federation of Labor, begged the delegates to "look before they leaped."

"There is no need for haste," he said. "This matter can be delayed two weeks without harm, whereas organized labor may be irretrievably injured by the passage of these resolutions in their present form. Organized labor was not on trial in Indianapolis. Organized labor does not approve of the acts of violence of which these men are charged."

An assessment of five cents per capita, to raise a fund of about $4,000 for the assistance of the convicted men's families, was planned.

NO ONE KNOWS, AS YET.

Wilson Says That No Cabinet Portfolios Have Yet Been Issued.

Princeton, N. J., Jan. 7.—President-elect Wilson has made it clear that nobody in the United States knows, as yet, who is going to be in his cabinet, or what will be the program he will suggest for the next congress. He declared that he had not offered a single cabinet portfolio to anyone and has not reached any conclusions as to plans for the extra session.

Mr. Wilson stated that while he had canvassed a variety of subjects and had talked over many names with Democratic leaders, he had not given a definite intimation in any direction either as to what his selections or his course with respect to legislation would be. He indicated, however, that he expected the extra session would not be devoted exclusively to tariff making, and said he would, in a special message, specify some of the subjects upon which he would like to see legislation enacted.

Comber Saves Three Men.

Boston, Jan. 6.—How three survivors of the sunken barge Bombay were swept to safety on board the whaleback steamer Bay View, by the same huge seas, which had capsized their small boat is told by the rescued Captain J. Then the barge began sending distress signals, and sank before the steamer could reach her.

SHIP SINKS; 22 DIE

EIGHT SURVIVORS ARE PICKED FROM RIGGING OF BATTERED STEAMER AFTER SIX HOURS.

BARK RAMMED AND SUNK

Captain and Wife Among the Victims —Rest of Dead Are Mostly Foreigners—Laden With Phosphate.

Newport News, Jan. 6. — Eight survivors of the steamer Julia Luckenbach, rammed and sunk in the Chesapeake bay by the British tramp steamer Indrakaula, arrived here and told how twenty-two of their number had gone down without a chance for life. The fortunate eight, after a six-hour battle with the gale which swept the coast, were taken from the rigging of their sunken ship by the Danish steamer Pennsylvania and brought here.

About To Anchor.

The Luckenbach, from Port Tampa to Baltimore, was about to anchor off Tangier Gas Buoy, at the mouth of the Potomac, early yesterday, when the Indrakaula caught it and cut the steamer practically in two. It went down like a rock and only the men on deck had a chance for life. The Indrakaula, badly damaged and in danger of sinking, drew off and beached. Captain Gilbert of the Luckenbach and his wife were among the lost.

The survivors had little more than taken to the topmast parts of the rigging of the submerged hulk when the gale passed over the bay and for six hours they fought for life while some of their number, exhausted, dropped off one by one to death.

With a wind blowing at cyclonic velocity and waves beating against them, the hardiest ones held fast until their clothes were torn to shreds and they were on the verge of exhaustion.

Chief Engineer Chris Knudson was one of those in the rigging. He endured the gale until his hands were bleeding from gripping the ropes. He became exhausted and dropped into the sea.

The Pennsylvania could not reach them at first, even with lifeboats, because of heavy seas. After many unsuccessful attempts lifelines were run to the struggling men and they were taken off one at a time. When taken on board the Pennsylvania some were unconscious.

According to the survivors, Captain Gilbert and the first and second officers were standing on the bridge when the collision occurred. There was no opportunity to give the alarm to those below. Captain Gilbert made a desperate effort to reach his wife and when last seen was swimming aft of the sinking ship.

"I don't know how I escaped," said Chief Officer Hunt. "After the ship went down I found myself dangling in the rigging and there I stayed. Not a lifeboat was to be had, so quickly did the Luckenbach go down."

Crew Mostly Foreigners.

Baltimore.—With the exception of Captain Gilbert, First Officer Hunt and one of the engineers, the crew of the Julia Luckenbach was composed of foreigners. They were signed here December 12, just prior to the sailing of the steamer for Port Tampa, laden with phosphate rock for Baltimore.

Kills Woman; Confesses.

Minneapolis.—John Conley, twenty-26 years old, late Saturday strangled Mrs. Bertha Anderson to death in her home, 411 Seventh avenue S, with one of her husband's neckties. He lit a match to see if she was dead. Then, terrified, he fled from the house and confessed the whole gruesome crime to the police an hour later. Meantime, the husband of the murdered woman found the body, and believing she had suffered a heart attack, called a physician. A pet poodle sat on the dead woman's body.

Those Peruna Testimonials How Are They Obtained?

S. B. HARTMAN, M. D.

For a great many years I have been gathering statistics as to the effects of Peruna when taken for catarrhal derangements. I have on hand thousands of unsolicited testimonials from people in all stations of life, who claim that after many years futile attempts to rid themselves of chronic catarrh by various forms of treatment they have found complete relief by the use of Peruna. These testimonials have come to me unrequested, unsolicited, unrewarded in any way, directly or indirectly. They have simply been gleaned from my private correspondence with patients that have been more or less under my treatment or taking my remedies.

No remedy, official or unofficial, has a greater accredited basis for the claims we make for it than Peruna as a remedy for catarrh.

I have never been opposed at any time to the regulations offered by the Pure Food and Drugs Act. I am not now opposed to its provisions, but I am opposed to the proposed amendments to give to a partisan board of physicians the unqualified authority to decide as to all therapeutic claims which may be made for a proprietary medicine. It is manifestly unjust to refer such questions to a body of men who are already convinced of the worthlessness of proprietary medicines. To give such a body of men the unlimited authority to decide whether our claims for Peruna are valid or not is a manifest violation of my constitutional rights.

My claims are based both on creditable theoretical grounds and upon irrefutable statistics. But I am quite willing to have our claims as to the composition of Peruna properly and thoroughly investigated, and if found to be false a proper penalty should be fixed. Or if I am making any statements concerning disease, as to the nature, symptoms or danger of any disease, if I am making any such statements as to unnecessarily frighten the people by false assumptions, I am willing to submit to any unbiased tribunal or investigation.

Mrs. Alice Bogle, 803 Clinton St., Circleville, Ohio, writes: "I want to inform you what Peruna has done for me. I have been afflicted with catarrh for several years. I have tried different medicines and none seemed to do me any good until I used Peruna. I have taken six bottles and can praise it very highly for the good it has done me. I also find it of great benefit to my children."

Peruna is for sale at all drug stores.

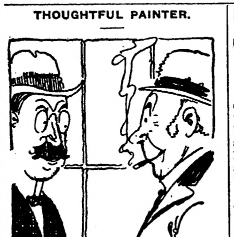
THOUGHTFUL PAINTER.



"I see you are paying the hospital expenses of that painter who fell off the roof."

"Yes; he's too good a man to lose. As he went down he touched up two or three places which would have been very hard to reach."

Roses in Medicone.

Roses at one time figured prominently in the pharmacopoeia. Pliny gives 32 remedies compounded of rose leaves and petals. Sufferers from nervous complaints used to seek relief by sleeping on rose pillows and one is told that Heliogabalus used to imbibe rose wine as a pick-me-up after his periodical gormandizing hours. The flower was also served at table, both as a garnish, in the way parsley is now used, and as a salad, and rose water was largely used for flavoring dishes. Roses as food have gone out of favor among western nations, but the Chinese still eat rose fritters.

Geography of Liquor.

Mayor Gaynor, discussing city government in his wonted illuminating and brilliant way, said in New York:

"We must not have one reform law for the rich and another for the poor. It is as bad for the millionaire to gamble in his club as for the laborer to gamble in a stuss joint. It is as bad to become intoxicated on champagne as on mixed ale.

"Too many reformers, so-called, think that when a man is drunk on Fifth avenue he is ill, and when a man is ill on Third avenue he is drunk."

THE BEST TEACHER.
Old Experience Still Holds the Palm.

For real practical reliability and something to swear by, experience—plain old experience—is able to carry a big load yet without getting sway-backed.

A So. Dak. woman found some things about food from Old Experience a good, reliable teacher.

She writes:

"I think I have used almost every breakfast food manufactured, but none equal Grape-Nuts in my estimation.

"I was greatly bothered with weak stomach and indigestion, with formation of gas after eating, and tried many remedies for it but did not find relief.

"Then I decided I must diet and see if I could overcome the difficulty that way. My choice of food was Grape-Nuts because the doctor told me I could not digest starchy food.

"Grape-Nuts food has been a great benefit to me for I feel like a different person since I begun to eat it. It is wonderful to me how strong my nerves have become. I advise everyone to try it, for experience is the best teacher.

"If you have any stomach trouble—can't digest your food, use Grape-Nuts food for breakfast at least, and you won't be able to praise it enough when you see how different you feel."

NO LONGER SELECTS THE HAT

Hubby's First and Last Experience at a Millinery Store Was Altogether Too Costly.

Congressman Ralph W. Moss of Indiana did not care much for a hat his wife wore. He finally spoke about it. Mrs. Moss admitted that it was plain, and, instead of taking exceptions to her husband's remark, invited him to accompany her the next time she bought a hat.

"I can certainly pick out a better one than that," said Mr. Moss.

So they went to the store together. Mrs. Moss said not a word as the comely milliner displayed one beautiful bonnet after another. It was the first time Mr. Moss had ever been in a millinery store, but he appeared to be at ease, and finally selected one of the most joyful creations in the entire stock. Mrs. Moss looked well in it. She was pleased.

"I'll take that," said the Hoosier congressman. "How much is it?"

"Forty dollars," said the pretty girl without even a blink.

Mr. Moss saw blue stars, but luckily had just come from the bank, and was able to produce that much in cash. Now he lets Mrs. Moss buy her own hats and he does not complain about their being plain.—Judge.

CHAPTER I.

Twilight in the Park.

"You may wait, Renaud."

The voice was firm, but the lady herself hesitated as she stepped from the tonneau. There was no answer. Holding the flapping ends of her veil away from her face, she turned and looked fairly at the driver of the machine.

He seemed a businesslike, capable man, though certain minor details of his chauffeur's rig were a bit unusual, and now that he had been obliged, by some discomfort, to remove his goggles, his face appeared pleasant and quite untanned. His passenger noted these things, remarking: "Oh, it isn't Renaud!"

"No, Mademoiselle; Renaud hadn't showed up at the office when you telephoned, so they put me on in his place."

"Ah, I see." Accent seemed to imply, however, that she was not quite pleased. "The manager sent you. And your name is—?"

"My name—rather odd name—Hand."

The face half hidden behind the veil remained impassive. A moment's hesitation, and then the lady turned away with a short, "You will wait?"

"As mademoiselle wishes. Or shall I perhaps follow slowly along the drive?"

"No, wait here. I shall return—soon."

The young woman walked away, erect, well-poised, lifting skirts skillfully as she paused a moment at the top of the stone steps leading down into the tiny park. The driver of the machine, free from observation, allowed a perplexed look to occupy his countenance. "What the devil is to pay if she doesn't return—soon!"

The avenue lifts a camel's hump toward the sky in the space of fifteen blocks, and on the top, secure as the howdah of a chieftain, stands the noble portico of the old college. To the westward, as every one knows, lie the river and the more pretentious park; on the east an abrupt descent offers space for a small grassy playground for children, who may be seen, during the sunny hours of the day, romping over the slope.

As the gaze of the woman swept over the charming little pleasance, and beyond, over the miles of sign-boards, roofs, chimneys and intersecting streets, the serious look disappeared from her face. Summer haze and distance shed a gentle beauty over what she knew to be a clamoring city—New York. Angles were softened, noises subdued, sensational scenes lost in the dimmed perspective. To a chance observer, the prospect would have been deeply suggestive; in the woman it stirred many memories. She put back her veil; her face glowed; a long sigh escaped her lips. Slowly she walked down the steps, along the sloping path to a turn, where she sank down on a bench. A rosy, tired child, rather the worse for mud-pies, and hanging reluctantly at the hand of a nonchalant nurse, brought a bit of the woman's emotion to the surface. She smiled radiantly at the lagging infant.

The face revealed by the uplifted veil was of a type to accompany the youthful but womanly figure and the spirited tread. Beautiful she would be counted, without doubt, by many an observer; those who loved her would call her beautiful without stint. But more appealing than her beauty was the fine spirit—a strong, free spirit, loving honesty and courage—which glowed like a flame behind her beauty. Best of all, perhaps, was a touch of quaintness, a slightly comic twist to her lips, an imperceptible alertness of manner, which revealed to the initiated that she had a sense of humor in excellent running order.

It was evident that the little excursion was of the nature of a pilgrimage. The idle hour, the bit of holiday, became a memorial, as recollection brought back to her the days of childhood spent down yonder, a few squares away, in this very city. They seemed bright in retrospect, like the pleasant paths of a quiet garden, but they had ended abruptly, and had been followed by years of activity and colorful experience in another country. Through it all what anticipations had been lodged in her return to Home! Something there would complete the story—the story with its secret ecstasies and aspirations—the story of the ardent springs of youth.

Withdrawing her gaze from the scene below, though with apparent reluctance, she took from the pocket of her coat an opened envelope which she regarded a moment with thoughtfulness before drawing forth the enclosures. There were two letters, one of which was brief and written in bad script on a single sheet of paper bearing a legal head. It was dated at Charlesport, Maine, and stated that the writer, in conformity with the last wish of his friend and client, Hercules Thayer, was ready to transfer certain deeds and papers to the late Mr. Thayer's designated heir, Agatha Redmond; also that the writer requested an interview at Miss Redmond's earliest convenience.

Holding the half-opened sheets in her hand, the lady closed her eyes and sat motionless, as if in the grasp of an absorbing thought. With the disappearing child, the signs of life on the hillside had diminished. The traffic of the street passed far below, the sharp click-click of a pedestrian now and then sounded above, but no one passed her way. The hum of the city made a blurred wash of sound, like the varying yet steady wash of the sea. As she opened her eyes again, she saw that the twilight had perceptibly deepened. Far away, lights began to flash out in the city, as if a million fireflies, by twos and threes and dozens, were waking to their nocturnal revelry.

On the hill the light was still good, and the lady turned again to her reading. The other letter was written on single sheets of thin paper in an old-fashioned, beautiful hand. Wherever a double-s occurred, the first was written long, in a style of sixty years ago; and the whole letter was as easily legible as print. Across the top was written: "To Agatha Redmond, daughter of my ward and dear friend, Agatha Shaw Redmond;" and below that, in the lawyer's choppy handwriting, was a date of nearly a year previous. As Agatha Redmond read the second letter, a smile, half of sadness, half of pleasure, overspread her countenance. It ran as follows:

"Ilion, Maine.

"My Dear Agatha: I take my pen in hand to address you, the daughter of the dearest friend of my life, for the first time in the twenty-odd years of your existence. Once as a child you saw me, and you have doubtless heard my name from your mother's people from time to time; but I can scarcely hope that any knowledge of my private life has come to you. It will be easy, then, for you to pardon an old man for giving you, in this fashion, the confidence he has never been able to bestow in the flesh.

"When you read this epistle, my dear Agatha, I shall have stepped into that next mystery, which is Death. Indeed, the duty which I am now discharging serves as partial preparation for that very event. This duty is to make you heir to my house and estate and to certain accessory funds which well enable you to keep up the place.

"You may regard this act, possibly, as the idiosyncrasy of an unbalanced mind; it is certain that some of my kinsfolk will do so. But while I have been able to bear up under their greater or less displeasure for many years, I find myself shrinking before the possibility of dying absolutely unknown and forgotten by you. Your mother, Agatha Shaw, of blessed memory now for many years, was my ward and pupil after the death of your grandfather. I think I may say without undue self-congratulation that few women of their time have enjoyed as sound a scheme of education as your mother. She had a knowledge of mathematics, could construe both in Latin and Greek, and had acquired a fair mastery of the historic civilization of the Greeks, Egyptians and ancient Babylonians. While these attainments would naturally be insufficient for a man's work in life, yet for a woman they were of an exceptional order.

"Sufficient to say that in your mother's character these noteworthy abilities were supplemented by gracious, womanly arts; and when she arrived at maturity, I offered her the honor of marriage.

"It is painful for me to recall the scene and the consequences of your mother's refusal of my hand, even after these years of philosophical reflection. It were idle for a man of parts to allow a mere preference in regard to his domestic situation to influence his course of action in any essential manner, and I have never permitted my career to be shaped by such details. But from that time, however, the course of my life was changed. From the impassioned orator and preacher I was transformed into the man of books and the study, and since then I have lived far from the larger concourses of men. My weekly sermon, for twenty years, has been the essence of my weekly toil in establishing the authenticity, first, of the entire second gospel, and second, of the ten doubtful verses in the fifteenth chapter. My work is now accomplished—for all time, I believe.

"From the inception of what I considered my life mission, I made the resolve to bequeath to Agatha Shaw whatever manuscripts or other material of value my work should lead me to accumulate, together with this house, in which I have spent all the later years of my life. You are Agatha Shaw's only child, therefore to me a foster-child.

"Another reason, four years ago, led me to confirm my former testament. From time to time I have informed myself concerning your movements and fortunes. The work you have chosen, my dear Agatha, I can but believe to be fraught with unusual dangers to a young woman. Therefore I hope that this home, modest as it is, may tempt you to an early retirement from the stage, and lead you to a more private and womanly career. This I make only as a request, not as a condition. I bid you farewell, and give you my blessing.

"Faithfully yours,
"HERCULES THAYER."

Agatha Redmond folded the thin sheets carefully. There was a mist in her gaze as she looked off toward the distant city lights.

"Dear old gentleman! His whole love-story, and my mother's too, perhaps!" Her quickened memory recalled childish impressions of a visit to a large country house and of a solemn old man—he seemed incredibly ancient to her—and of feeling that in some way she and her mother were in a special relationship to the house. It was called "the old red house," and was full of fascinating things. The ancient man had bidden her go about and play as if it were her home, and then had called her to him and laid open a book, leading her mind to regard its mysteries. Greek! It seemed to her as if she had begun it there and then. Later the mother became the teacher. She was nursed, as it were, within sight of the windy plains of Troy and to the sound of Homeric hymns—and all by reason of this ancient scholar.

There was a vivid picture in her mind, gathered at some later visit, of a soft hillside, a small white church standing under its balm-of-gilead tree, and herself sitting by a stone in the old churchyard, listening to the strains of a hymn which floated out from the high, narrow windows. She remembered how from without she had joined the hymn, singing with all her small might; and suddenly the association brought back to her a more recent event and a more beautiful strain of music. Half in reverie, half in conscious pleasure in the exercise of a facile organ, she began to sing:

"Free of my pain, free of my burden of sorrow,
At last I shall see thee—"

The song floated in a zone of silence that lay above the deep-murmuring city. The voice was no more than the half-voice of a flute, sweet, gentle, beguiling. It told, as many songs tell, of little earthly Love in the grasp of mighty Fate. Still she sang on softly.

Suddenly the song ceased, and the reminiscent smile gave place to an expression of surprise, as the singer became conscious of a deeper shadow falling directly in front of her. She glanced up quickly, and found herself looking into the face of a man whose gimlet-like gaze was directed upon herself.

Quickly she rose, she could not turn into the path before the gentle man, hat in hand, with a deep bow and clearly enunciated words, arrested her impulse to flight.

"Pardon, Mademoiselle, I am a stranger in the city. I was directed this way to Van Cortlandt Hall, but I find I am in error, intrigued—in confusion. Would mademoiselle be so good as to direct me?"

The tones had a foreign accent. There was something, also, in their bland impertinence which put Miss Redmond on her guard. He was a good-sized, blond person, carefully dressed, and at least appeared like a gentleman.

Miss Redmond looked into the smooth, neat countenance, upon which no record either of experience or of thought was engraved, and decided fleetingly that he was lying. She judged him capable of picking up acquaintances on the street, but thought that more originality might be expected of him.

Suddenly she wished that she had returned sooner to her car, for though she was of an adventurous nature, her bravery was not of the physical order; and she disliked to have the appearance of unconventionality. After the first minute she was not so much afraid as annoyed. Her voice became frigid, though her dignity was somewhat damaged by the fact that she bungled in giving the desired information.

"I think monsieur will find Van Cortlandt Hall in the College grounds two blocks south—no, north—of the gateway yonder, at the upper end of this walk."

"Ah, mademoiselle is but too kind!" He bowed deeply again, hat in hand. "I thank you profoundly. And may I say, also, that this wonderful picture—" here he spread eloquent hands toward the half-quiescent city whose thousand eyes glimmered over the lower distance—"this panorama of occidental life, makes a peculiar appeal to the imagination?"

The springs of emotion, touched potently as they had been by the surging recollections of the last half-hour, were faintly stirred again in Miss Redmond's heart by the stranger's grandiloquent words. Unconsciously her features relaxed, though she did not reply.

"Again I pray mademoiselle to pardon me, but only a moment past I heard the song—the song that might be the sigh of all the daughters of Italy. Ah, Mademoiselle, it is wonderful! But here in this so fresh country, this youthful, boisterous, too prosperous country, that song is like—like—like Arabian spices in a kitchen. Is it not so?"

Miss Redmond was moving up the steps toward the entrance, hesitating between the desire to snub her interlocutor and to avoid the appearance of fright. The man, meanwhile, moved easily beside her, courteously distant, discourteously insistent in his prattle. But the motor-car was now not far away.

The stranger looked appealingly at her, seemingly sure of a humorous answering look to his pleasantry. It was not wholly denied. She yielded to a touch of amusement with a cool smile, and hastened her steps. The man kept pace without effort. Luckily, the car stood only a few feet away, with Renaud, or rather Hand, at the curb, holding open the door. A vague bow and a lifting of the hat, and apparently the stranger went the other way. She felt a foolish relief, and at the same instant noted with surprise that the cover of her car had been raised.

"Why did you raise the top?"

"It appeared to me, Mademoiselle, that it was likely to rain."

"Put it down again. It will not rain," Miss Redmond was saying, when, from sidelong eyes, she saw that the stranger had not turned in the other direction, after all, but was almost in her tracks, as though he were stalking game. With foot on the step she said sharply, but in a low voice, "To the Plaza quickly," then immediately added, with a characteristic practical turn: "But don't get yourself arrested for speeding."

"No, Mademoiselle, with this car I can make—" Even as the chauffeur replied, Miss Redmond's sharpened senses detected a passage of glances between him and the stranger, now close behind her.

She sprang into the tonneau and seized the door, but not before the man had caught at it with a stronger hold, and stepped in close after her. The chauffeur was in his seat, the car was moving slowly, now faster and faster. Suddenly the bland countenance slid very near her own, while firm hands against her shoulders crowded her into the farther corner of the tonneau.

"O Renaud—Hand!" she cried, but the driver made no sign. "Help, help!" she shrieked, but the cry was instantly choked into a feeble protest. A mass of something, pressed to her mouth and nostrils, incited her to superhuman efforts. She struggled frantically, and succeeded in getting her head for an instant at the opening, while she clutched her assailant and held him helpless. But only for a moment. The firm large hand quickly overpowered even the strength induced by frenzy, and in another minute she was lying unresisting on the soft cushions of the tonneau.

The car careened through the streets, the figure of the unresponsive Hand mocked her cries for help, the neat hard face of the stranger continued to bend over her. Then everything swam in a maelstrom of duller and duller sense, the world grew darker and fainter, till finally it was lost in silence.

CHAPTER II

Hambleton of Lynn

The Hambletons of Lynn had not distinguished themselves, in late generations at least, by remarkable deeds, though their deportment was such as to imply that they could if they would. They frankly regarded themselves as the elect of earth, if not of Heaven, always, however, with a becoming modesty. Since 1636 the family had pieced out its existence in the New World, tenaciously clinging to many of its old-country habits. It had kept the "b" in the family name, for instance; it had kept the name itself out of trade, and it had indulged its love of country life at the expense of more than one Hambleton fortune.

A daughter in law was once reported as saying that it would have been a good thing if some Hambleton had embarked in trade, since in that case they might have been saved from devoting themselves exclusively to an illustration of polite poverty. She was never forgiven, and died without being reconciled to the family. As to the spelling of the name, the family claimed ancestral authority as far back as King Fergus the First. Mrs. Van Camp, a relative by marriage—a woman considered by the best Hambletons as far too frank and worldly-minded—informed the family that King Fergus was as much a myth as Dido, and innocently brought forth printed facts to corroborate her statement. One of the ladies Hambleton crushed Mrs. Van Camp by stating, in a tone of deep personal conviction, with her cap awry, "So much the worse for Dido!"

A salient strength persisted in the Hambletons—a strength which retained its character in spite of cross-currents. The Hambleton tone and the Hambleton ideas retained their family color, and became, whether worthily or not, a part of the Hambleton pride. More than one son had lost his health or entire fortune, which was apt not to be large, in attempts to carry on a country place. "A Hambleton trait!" they chuckled, with as much satisfaction as they considered it good form to exhibit. In Lynn, where family pride did not bring in large returns, this phrase became almost synonymous with genteel foolishness.

The Van Camp fortune, which came near but never actually into the family, was generally understood to have been made in shoes, though in reality it was drugs.

"People say 'shoes' the minute they hear the word Lynn, and I'm tired of explaining," Mrs. Van Camp put it. She was third in line from the successful druggist, and could afford, if anybody could, to be supercilious toward trade. But she wasn't, even after twenty years of somewhat restless submission to the Hambleton yoke. And it was she who [illegible] her last visit to the family [illegible]hold, help up before the young James the advantages of a commercial career.

"You're a nice boy, Jimsy, and I can't see you turned into a poor lawyer. You're not hard-headed enough to be a good one. As for being a minister, well—no. Go into business, dear boy, something substantial, and you'll live to thank your stars."

Jimsy received this advice at the time with small enthusiasm, and a reservation of criticism that was a credit to his manners, at least. But the time came when he leaned on it.

Her own child, however, Mrs. Van Camp encouraged to a profession from the first. "Aleck isn't smart enough for business, but he may do something as a student," was Mrs. Van Camp's somewhat trying explanation; and Aleck did do something as a student. Extremely impatient with any exhibition of laziness, the mother demanded a good accounting of her son's time. Aleck and Jim, who were born in the same year, ran more or less side by side until the end of college. They struggled together in sports and in arguments, "rushed" the same girl in turn or simultaneously, and spent their long vacations cruising up and down the Maine coast in a thirty-foot sail-boat. Once they made a more ambitious journey all the way to Yarmouth and the Bay of Fundy in a good-sized fishing-smack.

But when college was done, their ways separated. Mrs. Van Camp, in the prime of her unusual faculties, having decorated the Hambleton 'scutcheon like a gay cockade stuck airily up into the breeze. She had no part nor lot in the family pride, but understood it, perhaps, better than the Hambletons themselves. Her crime was that she played with it. Aleck, a full-fledged biologist, went to the Little Hebrides to work out his fresh and salad theory concerning the nerve system of the clam.

James, third son of John and Edith Hambleton of Lynn, had his eyes thoroughly opened in the three months after Commencement by a consideration of the family situation. It seemed to him that from babyhood he had been burningly conscious of the pinching and skimping necessary to maintain the family pride. The two older brothers were exempt from the scorching process, the eldest being the family darling and the second a genius. Neither one could rationally be expected, "just at present," to take up the family accounts and make the income square up with even a decently generous outgo. And there were the girls yet to be educated. Jim had no special talent to bless himself with, either in art or science. He was inordinately fond of the sea, but that did not help him in choosing a career. He had good taste in books and some little skill in music. He was, indeed, thrall to the human voice, especially to the low voice in woman, and he was that best of all critics, a good listener. His greatest riches, as well as his greatest charm, lay in a spirit of invincible youth; but he was no genius, no one perceived that more clearly than himself.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

Force of Habit.

An attache at the statehouse has a nose which slightly turns to the left, and when asked why, replies it turns that way from force of habit.

"Habit?" some one asked one day, "how can a nose have a habit?"

"The nose didn't," was the reply, "but I did. When I was a boy my nose naturally turned to the right. It embarrassed me and I was guyed about it so much that I decided I would pull it straight. So I began to draw my left hand across it in the hope I could straighten it. The motion became a habit. I did it when in school, in church, and my mother said I did it when asleep. Before I could stop the habit I had the end of my nose pulled over to the other side, and I decided to let it stay that way."—Indianapolis News.

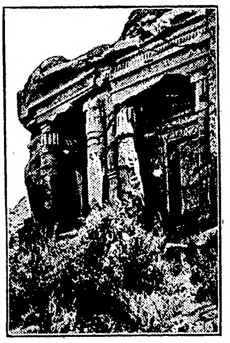
CRUELEST WORSHIP IN WORLD

Tribe in India Who Inflict Horrible Torture on Persons to Please Their Idols.

Calcutta.—The cruelest and the kindest idols in the world have been located in India by Hugh Fisher, the English archaeologist. Kali, the tutelary deity of that well organized federation of professional assassins called the Thugs, is the cruelist, while Jaggernaut, or Jagannatha, the "lord of the world," is the kindest.



Ruined Temple Where Once the Goddess Kali Was Worshiped.

In the role of the cruelist the idol of Kali is terrible to behold. It is black, with four arms, the palms of the hands smeared with blood. In one hand is a sword and in another the severed head of one of the god's victims. The face and the breast of this idol are smeared with blood and the eyes are red. Her hair is matted and she has projecting, fanglike teeth between which protrudes a tongue dripping blood. In some of the idols of this dread goddess she wears a necklace of skulls, and she is girded with serpents.

The ritual performed in the worship of Kali involves the most revolting rites, which the British government has long tried to suppress, but not with complete success. To the "true worshipers of Kali" human sacrifice is essential. The victim, always a male, was taken to the temple after sunset and there imprisoned. The next morning he was dead and the priests told the people that Kali had sucked his blood in the night.

Cutting their flesh and burning portions of their bodies is part of the devotion required of Kali's worshippers. It is in her worship that the famous "hook swinging festival" was held until prohibited by the British. Those who vowed themselves to self-torture submitted to be swung in the air from hooks which passed through their muscles just over the shoulder blades. The hooks were hung from a long cross beam which seesawed upon a long upright pole. The victim was thus hoisted into the air and swung in a circle for fifteen or twenty minutes. Many died under the excruciating pain.

HER FATAL GIFT OF BEAUTY

Missouri Girl in New York, Harassed by Men, Tried Suicide, but Is Prevented.

New York.—For ten years Mary Morgan fought the "battle of the city" in an endeavor to earn enough money to keep life in her own body and send something "back home" to her crippled father in De Soto, Mo. She was pretty, an expert stenographer, hard working, honest and good. But she found it impossible, almost, to keep a job.

"I am too good looking," she said to her friends as she told how she had been obliged to leave one office after another because men tried to force unwelcome attentions on her, or girls appeared who would work for less money. Recently she lost another job. Just before daybreak a policeman saw a young woman walking toward the North river pier. Her head was bowed and she was muttering to herself. Just as she was about to cast herself into the water he caught her. The girl was Mary Morgan.

"Let me go, let me go," she shrieked. "I want to die. They put another girl in my place. She will work for less than I could and I tried so hard to be good."

At Bellevue it was found she had almost starved herself to death and that her clothing was far too thin for this season of the year.

GOSSIPING COST HIM $15,000

Court Holds Woman Can Collect on False Tale That Caused Divorce From Husband.

Sacramento, Cal.—Gossips who poison the mind of husband or wife against the other are liable for practically any amount of damages, according to a decision of the supreme court.

Mrs. Beula Works brought suit against J. P. Campbell for $15,000, alleging that through false reports he had actuated her to divorce her husband. She states she believed his reports at the time, but later learned they were maliciously untrue.

The lower court ruled against Mrs. Works, holding that the husband was the aggrieved party. The supreme court, however, declares either husband or wife under the circumstances has grounds for damages.

FEDERAL PROTECTION OF BIRDS

THE United States department of agriculture is responsible for the startling statement that, in the year 1904, insect pests cost this country no less than $420,100,000. Here are the figures of government experts:

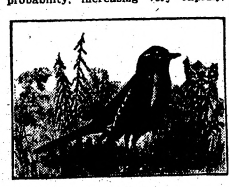
Product.	Percentage of Loss.	Amount of Loss.
Cereals	10	$200,000,000
Hay	10	53,000,000
Cotton	10	60,000,000
Tobacco	10	5,300,000
Truck crops	20	53,000,000
Sugars	10	5,000,000
Fruits	20	27,000,000
Farm forests	10	11,000,000
Miscellaneous crops	10	5,800,000
Total		$420,100,000

Keeping in mind this enormous loss, consider also the following facts:

(1) That insectivorous birds do more than all other agencies combined to keep down insect pests;

(2) That such birds undoubtedly are rapidly decreasing in number; and that, therefore,

(3) Destructive insects are, in all probability, increasing very rapidly, with the result that the damage they do is mounting up, year by year.



The Robin.

Highly Valuable as an Insect and Grub Destroyer, But Murdered by the Thousands for Pot-Pies in the South.

It is perfectly apparent that here is a situation which demands immediate action, and that this action should bring about the vigilant protection for all time, and in all parts of the country, of all insectivorous birds. Many of the most useful of these birds are already on the tobogganslide toward extermination, as the result of stupid state legislation, or the lax enforcement of such laws as have been enacted. To be explicit:

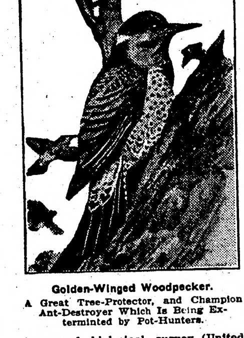
There are seven states in which the robin is being legally killed by the tens of thousands annually as "game"! These states are Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee and Maryland.

The black bird is legalized "game," and suffers the same fate in four states—Louisiana, South Carolina, Tennessee and Pennsylvania—and the District of Columbia besides.

Doves are slaughtered by the wholesale in 26 states, much to the loss of the farmers, for this bird is a great eater of weed seeds.

Cranes, which are also very useful birds, are much hunted for food and for "sport" in Colorado, Nebraska, North Dakota and Oklahoma.

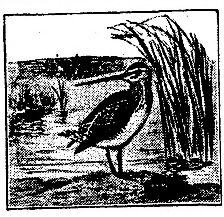
Of the sixty-odd species of shorebirds (i. e., snipe, curlews, plover, sandpipers and the like), at least 30 feed on noxious insects; yet all of these birds are rapidly disappearing. According to Mr. W. L. McAtee of the bureau of biological survey (United States department of agriculture):



Golden-Winged Woodpecker.

A Great Tree-Protector, and Champion Ant-Destroyer Which Is Being Exterminated by Pot-Hunters.

"The black-bellied plover, or beetlehead, which occurred along the Atlantic coast in great numbers years ago, is now seen only as a straggler. The golden plover, once exceedingly abundant east of the Great Plains, is now rare.... The Eskimo curlew within the last decade has probably been exterminated, and other curlews greatly reduced. . . . So adverse to the shorebirds are present conditions that the wonder is that any escape. In both fall and spring they are shot along the whole route of their migration north and south.



The Jacksnipe.

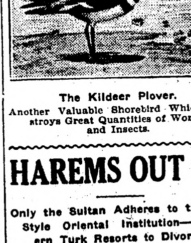
A Useful Bird Which Is Rapidly Becoming Extinct.

The accompanying illustrations present portraits of a group of birds, most of which the average person probably knows by sight, though I fear that only a small minority have a clear idea of their very great economic worth.

The jacksnipe (or Wilson's snipe) is one of the shorebirds (referred to by Mr. McAtee), which, as a family, are being rapidly exterminated. It destroys large numbers of worms and larvae, for which it probes with its long bill in the soft earth of corn and potato fields—thereby doing the farmer a great service—as well as along the shores of ponds, lakes and streams. It also feeds on grasshoppers and other injurious insects. It should be carefully protected, especially during the breeding season.

The kildeer plover is another valuable and beautiful shorebird which is being hunted to death. It frequents meadows and pasture lands, as well as shores, and devours great quantities of mosquitoes, crane flies, grasshoppers, army worms, cut worms, caterpillars, cotton-boll weevils, clover-leaf weevils, rice weevils, marine worms, wire worms and crayfish.

Doubtless everybody knows the robin, perhaps the most democratic of our birds, beloved in the northern states for his cheerful song and his handsome appearance, glad everywhere to be the companion and the friend of man when he is well treated, and highly valuable as a destroyer of harmful grubs, worms and insects. Yet this bird is murdered literally by the thousands for pot-pies by negroes and poor whites in the southern states above mentioned, and is more or less hunted in other states. Mr. E. A. McIlhenny, who lives on Avery Island, La., says that during the ten days or two weeks of the "robin season" (in January when the berries are ripe) at least 10,000 of these useful and beautiful birds are slaughtered daily for the pot. "Every negro man and boy who can raise a gun is after them," says Mr. McIlhenny.

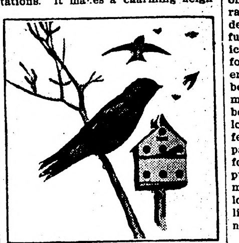


The Kildeer Plover.

Another Valuable Shorebird Which Destroys Great Quantities of Worms and Insects.

Although this bird causes some loss to small fruit growers, it certainly does vastly more good than harm. It is constantly at work on lawns and fields hunting for destructive insects, which it is exceedingly difficult to keep in control. It devours many caterpillars, including hairy species, which infest the orchard, woodland and shade trees. Forty per cent. of its food is insects, and 43 per cent. wild fruit. It would pay the farmer well to go some expense in order to keep the robins away from his fruit trees and berry bushes rather than shoot these birds which are so useful to him in many ways. To murder them for pot-pies is, of course, nothing short of barbarous.

The purple martin is also fond of the society of man, and when not molested by the villainous English sparrows—and still more villainous men by whom it is shot for food, chiefly in the south—it is glad to breed in birdhouses near human habitations. It makes a charming neighbor and a very useful one, for it is remarkably swift and graceful on the wing, and is expert and persistent in catching rose beetles, May beetles, cucumber beetles, mosquitoes, house flies and flies that trouble horses and cattle. One observer records that 32 parent martins made 3,275 visits to their young in one day, each visit meaning, probably, anywhere from one to half a dozen insects.

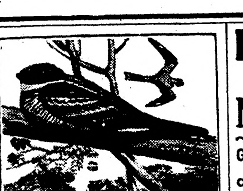


The Purple Martin.

An Industrious Hunter of Mosquitoes and Other Dangerous Insects, Which, Itself Is Being Hunted to Death as Food.

The nighthawk (also called "bullbat") is probably one of the most useful of birds. It feeds exclusively on insects, and ranks next to the golden-winged woodpecker (flicker) as a feathered destroyer of ants, which it takes when they are in the winged stage. Potato beetles, cucumber beetles, leaf hoppers, bugs of various kinds and enormous quantities of gnats and mosquitoes are found in their stomachs. They are entirely harmless, for they never feed on fruit, grain, grass or vegetables. Yet they are being hunted for sport and are being exterminated.

The loggerhead (or southern) shrike is a champion pest destroyer, a large percentage of its food being harmful rodents and destructive insects, the latter including grasshoppers, crickets and moths, which it frequently impales upon thorns or sharp twigs. It sometimes catches young birds (though this is more characteristic of the northern shrike, or butcher bird,) but its diet is chiefly insects and small rodents. It is, therefore, very valuable to the farmer.



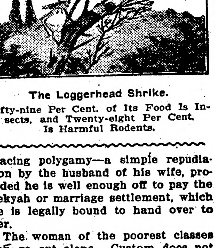
The Nighthawk.

One of the Most Useful of Insectivorous Birds Which Is Being Hunted for "Sport" and Exterminated.

The golden-winged woodpecker (also called "flicker," "highhole," etc.) is an industrious tree protector, and the most efficient of all feathered ant-eaters. It is also feeds freely upon beetles, grasshoppers, crickets, caterpillars, and other harmful insects, as well as on weed seds. Yet it is rapidly growing rare because it is much hunted for food. It should be protected everywhere and at all times.

In view of the decrease already accomplished in the general volume of bird life in America, in view of the enormous losses annually inflicted upon the people of this country by the ravages of insects, and in view of the destruction of wild life which is now furiously proceeding throughout America, the McLean bill, which is now before congress, to provide for the federal protection of all migratory birds, becomes the most important wild life measure that ever came before that body. In view of the annual economic loss that will continue as long as a federal migratory bird bill fails to pass, it is impossible for anyone to put forth one good reason—unless it be on purely technical grounds—against that measure. The Weeks bill, before the lower house of congress, is precisely like the McLean bill, and it matters not which one passes first.

Unless the people of this country wish to shut their eyes to their own interests, and pay out millions of dollars annually in the form of increased cost of living due to the losses caused by insect pests which would be destroyed by the birds, they should demand that a federal migratory bird bill be at once enacted into a law. It is Senate Bill No. 6497, and on the senate calendar it is No. 606. We cannot afford to wait until 1914 or 1915, and congress has full power to act this winter.



The Loggerhead Shrike.

Fifty-nine Per Cent. of Its Food Is Insects, and Twenty-eight Per Cent. Is Harmful Rodents.

HAREMS OUT OF DATE IN TURKEY

Only the Sultan Adheres to the Old Style Oriental Institution—Modern Turk Resorts to Divorce.

The domestic arrangements of the sultan are entirely different from those of his subjects. Most Turks have one wife; the sultan has no recognized sultana. Turks of high rank marry into their own class; the sultan forms unions with women of slave origin. The ordinary man may not look upon an unveiled woman except she be his relation or servant; the sultan has the right to talk with any woman in the land face to face. Turks of position model their households more or less on the European plan; the sultan's household is oriental.

That does not mean that in the imperial palace you would find women sipping sherbet or smoking narghilehs or clad in baggy trousers. On the contrary, you would find them smoking nothing more oriental than a cigarette, sitting on a European chair—and, yes, wearing corsets! But the code of morals is entirely different, says the New York Sun.

The imperial harem is founded on the old court system of the Byzantine emperors and has an etiquette and law of its own. The first fact one must grasp is that the wives or favorites of the sultan have no importance at all. They are nobodies. The daughter of a Circassian peasant may be honored by the sultan's favor and even bear him a child, but yet be distinguished by no other title than the commonplace "Kadin Effendi." Only the mother of the eldest son receives the royal designation of "sultan," her whole title being "Khareki sultan."

Her dignity only results from her being the mother of a possible heir to the throne; that is, in the event that the sultan has no brothers, for the brothers have the right of precedence as the elder male descendants. And the royal favorite of the moment will have transitory importance on account of the influence which she may exercise over the sultan.

Royal princesses are considered inferior to the mother of the sultan, who is the real queen of the little world of the harem, has absolute authority, a large staff of officials and the supreme title of "Valide sultan." Thus it happens that a woman of slave birth may, if she be the mother of an heir to the throne, eventually become the highest woman of the land.

Every royal princess has her daira, or separate apartments, slaves, servants and so on, the management of the household being given over to her kalfas, or ladies in waiting—that is to say, Turkish women of good birth who have remained unmarried.

Royal princesses rarely take a husband of their own rank. They are generally married by the sultan to the sons of men of wealth and position, such as pashas, officers of state, high civil officials and the like, a policy which is founded on a very practical reason, namely, that the arrangement makes the existence of a heriditary aristocracy impossible.

One of the paradoxes in Turkey is that the poorer a Turkish woman is the greater her freedom. The rich woman canont move a step unaccompanied. She sees Constantinople only from the windows of her closed brougham or through a veil thick enough to act as a mask. She may dress as exquisitely as a mannequin in a Paris dressmaker's showroom, but she must not display so much as an inch of embroidery in public.

When her husband wants to take a second wife, or grows tired of her and wishes to divorce her, he has both the opportunity and the means if he is a rich man. It is not chic among Turks of any education to take a second wife; but divorce is replacing polygamy—a simple repudiation by the husband of his wife, provided he is well enough off to pay the nekyah or marriage settlement, which he is legally bound to hand over to her.

The woman of the poorest classes can go out alone. Custom does not oblige her to wear her veil down. Should her husband, in a fit of anger, wish to divorce her, he must first of all produce the Nekyah, the dowry, in ready money, not an easy matter for a poor man.

The real danger to domestic happiness in the great mass of Turkish homes is the growing tendency of divorce, and a divorce wholly favorable to the man as against the woman.

The payment of the modest nekyah arranged at the time of his marriage is a simple affair, and it is seldom enough to keep the divorced wife for the rest of her days. She is forced to take refuge with her parents or to find shelter with some of her friends.

Day on Which Women Rule.

Candlemas day is not celebrated in Holland much more than in England, but its place is taken by a festival unknown in this country. Slipper day in the Netherlands is the one day in the year in which the Dutch woman claims superiority over her husband.

On that day she rules him to her heart's content, and he generally obeys good humoredly enough. That is, unless she is one of those ladies not unknown in Holland or in any other country who aspire to complete rule over their unhappy partners throughout the year.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Jumped, Killed; Stayed, Safe.

Ernest Woods, fireman, jumped and was killed, while Fred Lebush, engineer, stayed at his post and escaped death when the train from St. Albans, which they were driving, collided with an engine in the Grand Trunk yards at Montreal. Woods had barely leaped from the engine when the baggage car toppled over upon him.

GRAVITY FOR FUEL FEEDER

Coal Slides Down Pipe Into Back of Stove or Body of Furnace—Saves Much Hard Labor.

The labor of coaling the furnace or stove has been simplified by the invention of a North Dakota man. This invention is known as the gravity fuel feeder and the coal merely flows into the stove as a valve is opened. To do this, of course, the coal bin or hopper that holds the fuel must be located above the furnace or stove. A pipe then leads down from this source of supply into the back of the stove and the weight of the fuel above keeps this pipe always filled. A cut-off at the bottom of the valve holds back the avalanche but when more coal is needed this cut-off is opened and there is a rush which fills the furnace in an instant, without the back-straining labor of carrying shovelfuls or scuttlefuls to it.

STRAW AND GRASS FOR WOOD

Englishman Has Invented Efficient and Economical Substitute Material for Matches.

The annual consumption of wood in the manufacture of matches is almost incredible. In view of the scarcity of lumber and its consequent high prices, Carre, an Englishman, offers, says America, what he claims to be an efficient and economical substitute. It is a composite made of straw and dried grass and is called artificial wood.

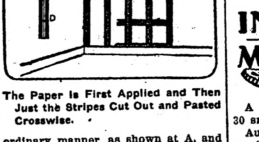
The straw is passed through crushing rolls, thence through cylindrical cutters which divide it into strips, afterward supplied with an adhesive. The strips, inclosed at both ends with layers of paper, are forced through other rollers and through linked molds in the form of a chain, where they are subjected to heat and pressure, when they emerge in the form of round splits and are then cut to the proper length for matches.

It is thought that this product may be used for building purposes.

PANEL WITH STRIPED PAPER

Method Shown in Illustration Whereby Stripes Can Be Made as Desired and in Divisions.

A method of hanging striped paper so as to give a panel effect is shown in the accompanying sketch, writes Milton W. Eddy of State College, Pa., in the Popular Mechanics. The striped paper is first hung in the ordinary manner, as shown at A, and then the stripes are cut out from a piece of the paper cut on a miter, as at C and D, and pasted across between the vertical stripes to form the panels as shown at B. These can be made up as desired and in divisions suitable to the paper design.



The Paper Is First Applied and Then Just the Stripes Cut Out and Pasted Crosswise.

Making Chocolate Creams.

A Trinidad firm that has been engaged in some lines of cacas manufacture, to meet the local demand, has recently commenced the manufacture of chocolate creams. It is said that the product compares favorably in quality with the best importer. The bonbons are put up in neat packets, which sell at 6 and 12 cents each, or 2 shillings (48.6 cents) a pound, and there are special wholesale quotations. The creams are made in several flavors. If the success which seems to be promised to this new manufacture is realized and a large development of the industry follows, it may in time practically stop the large importation of such goods from the United Kingdom, France and the United States.

GASOLINE IS RENDERED SAFE

Methods Employed by French Government Makes Accidents Impossible—Rules Are Severe.

Places where inflammable liquids are stored are classed by the French government with establishments which much conform to the most severe rules. In order to satisfy conditions imposed by the prefecture of the police a new apparatus invented by Martini and Huneke was adopted. This apparatus includes no complicated mechanism. It is automatic in its operation and independent of the workmen.

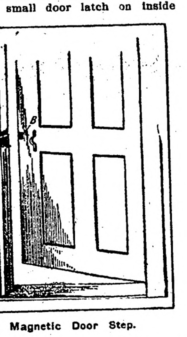
Throughout the apparatus in which the fuel is stored or handled air is replaced by carbonic acid gas, says the Engineering Magazine. This gas not only serves as a protecting agent but its pressure determines the movement of the liquid. Furthermore, the gas fills all the pipes and valves and acts in such a way that liquid can circulate only when the system is absolutely free of leaks. For instance, if a leak occurs at any point in the system the pressure of the gas will disappear and the liquid will remain in the reservoir, where there is no danger of explosion, since air is necessary to the formation of an explosive mixture. In fact, all danger which comes from external fire or even from sparks within the tank is removed.

The principle of operation of the Martini and Huneke apparatus as installed in the garages of the Compagnie des Omnibus de Paris consists of a storage reservoir or heavy sheet metal completely buried in the ground, an inlet panel and an outlet panel, a cylinder of compressed inert gas, and jacketed pipes joining the different parts of the system. A reservoir covered with asphalt is buried in the ground sufficiently to escape all danger of fire. To charge the tank with liquid fuel it is first filled with the inert gas, then connected to the fuel tank by two pipes; one siphons the liquid and the other permits gas from the reservoir to replace it as it runs out. By means of this system the small quantity of liquid which is left on the wall of the tank cannot form an explosive mixture as it never comes into contact with the air.

FOR HOLDING A DOOR CLOSED

Magnetic Bar Arranged to Eliminate Use of Small Latch—Easily Opened With Slight Push.

The sketch published herewith shows a magnetic bar used for holding a door shut. The object of this arrangement is to eliminate the use of the small door latch on inside doors, and thereby to save time in opening and closing the door.



Magnetic Door Step.

The device may also be used successfully in holding doors shut on pieces of furniture such as bookcases, sideboards and dressers. In the illustration shown herewith a straight magnetic bar A is set in the casing of the door.

A small square piece of iron B is fastened in the door. When the piece of iron in the door comes in contact with the magnet A the door is held shut, but it can easily be released with only a slight push. Any kind of knob or handle on the door will answer the purpose.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyser

A QUEER COUPLE

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

I FIRST made the acquaintance of Hortense and Robert Perrichon while I was still police commissary in the Pantin district. A Scotland Yard official happened to be in my office when they were ushered in, and at the sight of them he leaned back in his chair convulsed with laughter.

"What's the fun?" I asked.

"Why," he roared, "it's Sally and Sampson Brass come to life!"

I had not read Dickens, and therefore did not understand the allusion. But when after his return to London my English colleague sent me an illustrated copy of "The Old Curiosity Shop," I appreciated the joke. Like Dickens's famous but unscrupulous characters, the Perrichons were red-haired, tall and sallow-skinned, and curiously like each other, the resemblance being all the more striking because the woman wore her hair short. Hortense was christened Sally, a name that stuck to her.

The father of Hortense and Robert kept a "reach-me-down" shop in the Rue Faubourg-du-Temple, and had several times been convicted of dealing in stolen goods. After his death his son and daughter carried on the business, but, more cautious than the old man, managed to keep clear of the law, and added considerably to their income by lending money at fabulous rates.

After a few years together, brother and sister accused each other—probably with cause—of robbing the till, whereupon they gave up the shop, and Sally started a servants' registry office. Robert committed forgery, was sentenced to three years' imprisonment, and after the expiration of his time left the country. Sally also graced the dock in connection with a case of swindling, but was acquitted, and for a long while nothing was heard of her.

One morning a card was brought in to me bearing the name of Madame de Saint-Florent. It was Sally; and if her English godfather had been there he would have indulged in another laugh, for above her dowdy dress she wore a costly sable cape and a hat set rakishly on one side.

"I have something to tell you, M. Goron," she began in her gruff voice; "Robert is back."

"Your brother?"

She nodded.

"I am sorry to hear it," I said. "I have quite enough criminals on my hands, and could well have dispensed with him. But why did you come to tell me that?"

"Because I am afraid of him. He looked so shabby and hungry that I bought him a rig-out and allowed him to take his meals with me. The other day I came home unexpectedly and found him busy with the lock of the cupboard in my bedroom. I forbade him to come to the house again, and then he threatened me, and became so menacing that I gave him money to get rid of him. He will murder me one of these days."

"If Robert threatens you," I replied, "You have only to go to the police commissary in your district; he will take the matter up."

"It's no use of my going there, M. Goron. I do not bear the best of reputations—"

"That you do not."

"I know it, sir. And, therefore, the police commissary will not trouble about me; nor would Robert mind him much. But the very mention of your name frightens my brother, and were you but to say a word to him it would bring him to his senses. Please do this for me, M. Goron."

I told her that this affair did not concern me in any way. Sally, however, left me no peace. She said her life was in danger; and she begged so hard that I at last promised to see her brother, and, to use her own words, "frighten him to death."

"I shall be away from Paris for a week," I said, "so you had better send me Robert in ten or twelve days."

On my return from Cherbourg my secretary informed me that Robert had called.

"He has not grown handsomer," laughed my assistant. "I gave him a good talking to, and he promised to leave Sally alone in the future, although he asserts that all she told you about his threatening her was a pack of lies."

"Why did he not wait for my return?" I asked.

"I reckon, sir, he was too frightened of you, and preferred me to deal with him."

Several months elapsed, when the news reached me that a M. F—— had been found dead in a hotel in the Rue Lafayette. He was a widower, highly respected, and a member of two fashionable clubs. The postmortem showed he had died from poisoning, and everything pointed to a suicide, although neither his married daughter, his valet or cook could assign any reason for the act.

At the hotel I learned that M. F—— had come there the previous evening at about ten o'clock, and had paid for his room in advance. He had not locked his door, and was found the next morning lying fully dressed on the bed. The most careful examination of his papers failed to throw any light on the affair, and at the official inquest a verdict of suicide was returned.

It transpired that M. F—— had withdrawn large amounts from his bank, no trace of which could be found. He neither speculated nor gambled, and he always noted down every cent he spent. Yet of the hundred thousand francs that had disappeared no record could be found. What had become of the cash? His heirs moved heaven and earth to find it, but in vain.

Although I concurred in the verdict of suicide, I was not satisfied, for I scented blackmailers. Those who, like me, have lived in an atmosphere of crime, will know the mischief wrought by these scoundrels.

In the pantomime of life, wherein criminals play such an important role, swindlers and sharpers often impersonate the "funny man." But the blackmailer is the "villain," the traitor who stabs his victims in the back, and rarely leaves a trace of his deadly work.

When a few days after M. F——'s funeral I called on his daughter and expressed my view, she indignantly declared that there could be nothing hidden in her father's life—a man whose reputation had been above suspicion. Her husband was of the same opinion. I knew they were speaking the truth, and I also knew that I could not hope for any help from them.

After an anxious search I at last made an important discovery. M. F—— had engaged himself to a Baronne de V—— in Tours, and had concealed this fact from his daughter and his friends. Deeply in love with Madame de V——, he had pressed her hard to fix their wedding for an early date, whereupon it was arranged that it was to have taken place toward the end of June. In less than a fortnight, however, he had suddenly become despondent, and, to the lady's surprise, had informed her that the wedding had to be postponed.

All this was related to me by Madame de V——, who was eager to assist me in sifting the matter. As I rose to take my leave she said:

"The last time my poor friend was here he left his cigarette-case behind, and inside I found this scrap of paper. It is in his handwriting, and the notes in pencil refer to a sale of a small estate he owned. I am afraid you will not find it very useful."

I examined the leaflet with care.

"Madame," I replied, "this scrap discloses four distinct facts, which, pieced together, may supply a valuable clue."

"What facts?"

"The address printed at the top of the page is that of a shady cafe in the Boulevard Rochechouart. And did you notice the curious characters at the back?"

"Yes, I did. I fancied they were Hebrew letters."

"No, they are Arabic. From all this I deduce: First, that your friend, who could have gone to such a place only under compulsion, did not meet the people he had come to see; second, that, having had to wait for them, he whiled away the time by scribbling these notes on a piece of letter-paper he found lying on the table; third, that he grew impatient and restless, for the characters at the back are jotted down nervously and lack the firmness of the other writing; fourth, that, as Arabic is not a language usually taught at college, it is more than probable that M. F—— spent some time in our African colonies."

"Why, yes," Madame de V—— exclaimed. "I remember he once described to me a scene he witnessed in Oran."

"That simplifies matters," I rejoined, "and I can now set to work."

It is not always easy to dive into a dead man's past. The moment the human machinery has been brought to a standstill everything that once gravitated around him seems to disappear. He is forgotten by friends, and detractors who persecuted him to his last breath have potent reasons never to mention his name.

But the threads supplied to me by that note would, I expected, put me on the right course, and I felt I could not have any peace as long as the miscreants responsible for M. F——'s death went about unchallenged.

The statement made to me by M. F——'s daughter that her father's reputation was above suspicion was undoubtedly true as far as Paris was concerned. If, therefore, there was a blot in the man's life I had to look for it elsewhere, and Oran at once presented itself to my mind.

I made discreet inquiries, and learned that some twelve years ago M. F——, while in Oran, had allowed himself to be foolishly implicated in a scandal, which, thanks to powerful protection, had been hushed up.

While I was trying to clear up that side of the problem, it was also essential that I should know something of the people who frequented the cafe in the Boulevard Rochechouart, and I selected as my observatory a rival establishment a few doors off, whence I could watch those passing in and out.

I knew I could rely on my memory, and on the first day recognized many who in various ways had passed through my hands. Not a few of them had anything but clean records, but they were either book-makers, sharpers, or tricky horse-dealers, frequenters of the race-course, whose specialty lay in a different direction.

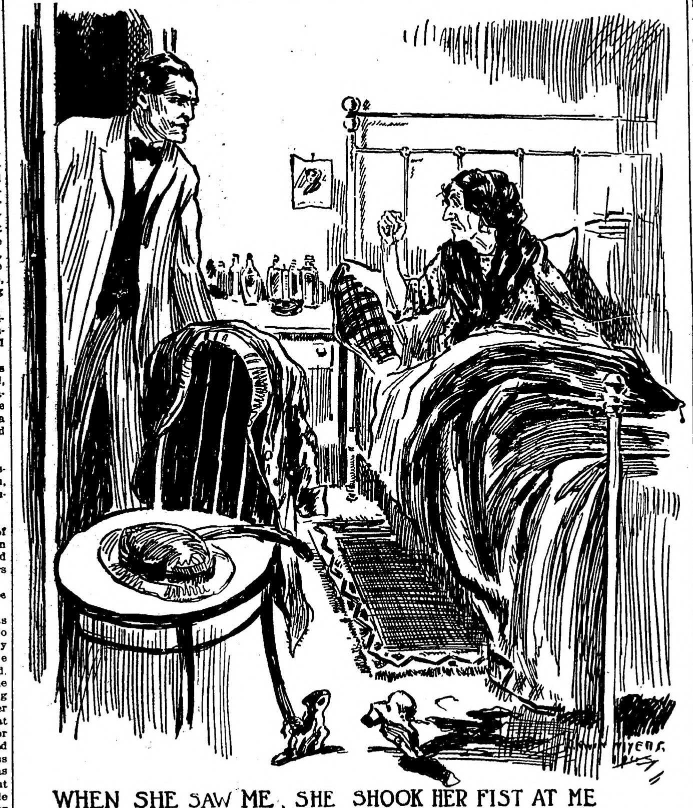
One evening, half an hour after I had reached my post of observation, I saw a clean-shaven man walk up and take his seat outside. After a while he tapped at the window for a waiter, who replied to a question put to him, whereupon the man flew into a rage and, talking rapidly, pulled once or twice the lobe of his left ear.

I looked at him in surprise. Many years ago I had known a fellow who, when his temper was roused, indulged in that curious habit. He was nicknamed the "Patriarch," because of his long beard; but he was reported to have died in the Toulon hospital. His name was Bachelet, and he had been a notorious blackmailer.

I cautiously got close to him, and then do doubt was possible. It was the "Patriarch," minus his beard and with his hair dyed black. Even had I not seen him pull his ear I should have known him by his eyes.

He was a cunning rascal, who to save his skin would not scruple to turn on his accomplices, which accounted for his having once received an ugly knife-thrust. Although he declared at the time he did not know his assailant, I suspected he had good reason to conceal the truth.

While I was watching him a man in a dirty blouse and torn cap, his face begrimed with dirt, the type of the Paris loafer, slouched past me and gave me a hardly perceptible nod. I had trouble to keep from laughing; for, despite his disguise, I recognized Darlaud, one of my men.



WHEN SHE SAW ME, SHE SHOOK HER FIST AT ME

Poor Darlaud! In his constant hunt after criminals of the lowest order he rarely had time to appear in respectable clothes. It was even said that on his sister's wedding-day he had not found a minute to put on a clean suit, and that when he attempted to enter the church the beadle wanted to give him into custody. I walked a little way in front of him and then turned around.

"Do you see that man outside the cafe over yonder?" I asked.

"Yes, sir."

"Do not lose sight of him, and report his movements to me."

On the afternoon of the third day Darlaud turned up.

"I scent a mystery, sir," he began.

"So do I," I replied; "but possibly the solution of the mystery that puzzles you may prove the solution of the one I am trying to work out."

"Well, sir," he continued, "I never lost sight of my man; I had to go carefully to work, for he is terribly wide-awake. He made me trot. He dined at a wine-shop in the Rue Louis-Blanc, then strolled toward the Rue Belleville and entered an hotel kept by a man called Coulon. A minute later I saw him at one of the windows in his shirt-sleeves, so I gathered he lived there. I at once asked for a room for myself, and managed to secure one two doors from our friend. His name, I discovered, is Charles Latouche, or, rather, that is how he entered in the hotel books.

"Toward ten o'clock he went, jumped on a 'bus, changed twice, and when near the Boulevard Ney got down and walked toward the Rue Rousseau. It is a dark street, or I could not have followed him. At the end of the street, where a house is being built, I saw him climb over the palings, looking for something or somebody. He remained there for two hours, and then returned home the way he came.

"Yesterday he rose late, spent the greater part of the afternoon in the cafe where you pointed him out to me; and, the moment darkness had set in again, took up his position behind the palings in the Rue Rousseau.

"I was beginning to wonder what it all meant, when I saw a woman walk down the street at a brisk pace. She was about a couple of yards from the place where I was hiding. At that moment Latouche rushed up to her, and, seizing her roughly by both arms, called out: 'I've caught you at last, you beauty.' But with a quick movement she shook him off, and turned on him like a tigress. At the same time her veil fell off and I recognized—whom do you think?—Sally, the—"

"I know. Go on with your story."

"'Bachelet!' she shrieked, 'I'll—'

"But the fellow did not let her continue. 'Don't bawl like that, you demon,' he hissed; 'only tell me where your brother is. You know how he swindled me, the despicable hound. Where is he?'

"'I swear I know nothing about him,' she cried. 'But if ever you dare again lay your dirty fingers on me, I'll bawl the name of Bachelet a little louder that I did tonight!' And she strutted away. As I wanted to report to you, I sent word to Berard to take my place and keep the fellow under observation. Do you want me to watch him further?"

"No, Darlaud," I said. "But tomorrow you must tell him I want to see him on a personal matter, and you will bring him here. Address him, of course, as Latouche."

The next morning at eleven he was shown in. His face was thin and crafty, and he peered at me with curiosity and cunning expressed in his puckered eyes.

"You are Latouche?" I began.

"Yes, sir—Charles Latouche."

"I have an interesting communication to make to you. A man has just died, leaving all his estate to a certain Charles Latouche; and I have been asked to hunt for this fortunate heir. Have you any papers to prove your identity in case you are that lucky man?"

He stared at me in bewilderment, and his hand slowly crept up to his left ear.

"Don't do that," I laughed, "or you will make me think of some one who had the same curious knack. His name was Bachelet."

He turned livid. But I saw it was with rage and not from fear.

"When you began about that legacy," he said, "I knew you were only making fun of me. Yes, I am Bachelet; and I changed my name because of my past life. If you had not sent for me, I would have come to see you, for I have something to say to you. It refers to Hortense and Robert Perrichon, sister and brother, twins, a queer couple, awfully alike. You know them?"

"Yes."

"They are a pair of scoundrels. The woman spread the story that she had to ask protection against her brother because he threatened her life; but I know better, it's all blarney. They meet at her house, and I have seen Robert go there repeatedly late at night and not come out again. Robert did me a bad turn. I meant to be even with him, and kept my eye on the pair. No easy matter, for they are never seen together. I found out he had dealings with a gentleman who seemed to stand in terror of him, and I traced this gentleman to his address in the Rue de Provence. His name, I discovered, was M. F——, and when I heard he committed suicide I connected Robert with the affair. I ought to say Robert and his sister; for they work together, although the sister always manages to keep in the background."

"I compliment you on your detective skill," I said; "but how is it you bring me this information after so many weeks have elapsed?"

"Because Robert suddenly disappeared, and I waited for his return before calling on you. Robert has been blackmailing that poor M. F——, and, under the threat of disclosing something that occurred at Oran, succeeded in extracting a lot of money from his victim."

"How do you know this?" I asked.

"I heard it from one of Robert's pals, whom he cheated, like he does everybody."

"Like he cheated you, too, in that business, I suppose?"

He started from his chair.

"No, M. Goron," he cried, "I had nothing to do with this affair, or I would not be here to tell you about it."

And the old rascal bowed himself out of the room.

It is not to the credit of mankind that nine-tenths of the information supplied to the police is prompted by revenge; Bachelet, of course, had participated in the blackmailing affair, and had evidently been defrauded by his confederate. With his usual caution, however, he had kept on the safe side, and could, therefore, risk denouncing him.

I ordered Inspector Berard to arrest Robert, and, as we had not yet discovered his whereabouts to watch Sally's house, where he was supposed to go every night.

Sally lived near the Port Clingnacourt, on the outskirts of the city, a forlorn spot facing the fortifications. It was a dismal building situated in what had once been a garden, but had become a wilderness. A thick, high hedge ran along the front of the house, which stood some fifty yards away from the road; a wall and a ditch protected it at the back. In the garden was a well, walled in with massive stone. Several windows at the back of the dwelling were broken and blocked with wooden boards. Altogether, it was a gloomy place that would have lent itself admirably for a sensational scene in a melodrama.

On the morning of the fifth day I found Inspector Berard sitting in my office looking very uncomfortable.

"What's amiss?" I asked.

"Everything," he replied. "Fabre and I watched the premises very closely and saw the woman go out several times. But never a sign of Robert. Last night at ten Fabre was at the back and I in front of the house, when a cab drove up, stopped about a hundred yards from the place, and some one alighted, whom, in the darkness, I could not see. Twenty minutes elapsed and I was wondering what had become of the individual. A figure then suddenly emerged from a heap of stones opposite me, and like lightning disappeared into the house. I had recognized Robert, but unfortunately he had been too quick for me.

"Having whistled softly, Fabre crept up from his hiding-place, and we conferred as to the best course to take. We remained on guard all night, and this morning at daybreak knocked at the door. After a quarter of an hour it was opened by the woman. She looked pale, and trembled from head to foot.

"'Who are you?' she asked.

"When we told her we wanted to see Robert, she screamed:

"'He is not here! I haven't seen him for ever so long. Go away, the lot of you. I have been taken ill during the night. You'd better send for a doctor.'

"And she crept up to her room.

"We then searched the house from top to bottom, but the fellow had disappeared. We are certain he is hidden somewhere. But where? Fabre thinks there must be a subterranean passage leading into the fields beyond, and I am inclined to think so too. That funny-looking well ought to be examined. I left the other men there. We want your help, sir."

I jumped into a cab with my secretary, and drove straight to Sally's house. Inspector Berard was outside, and informed me that the woman was really ill, and that some one had gone to fetch medical help.

I made a thorough investigation of the place, my men following my movement with curiosity. I went down the dried-up well, and saw that the old stones, firmly cemented together, had not been moved for a century. I tapped all the floors and walls, but found no trace of any secret passage.

"Any clue, sir?" asked Berard.

"Yes. Robert has been caught in his own trap, and cannot get away. And now I shall pay a visit to Sally."

The room I entered was in a terribly untidy state. The floor, chairs, and tables were littered with articles of the most heterogeneous description, and a strong smell of spirits pervaded the place. Sally was sitting up in bed, her head propped up with pillows. When she saw me, she shook her fist at me and said in an angry tone:

"What do you want? Don't bother me about Robert. He is gone away, thank heaven! and, what's more, I don't want him back. And now leave me alone. I'm ill."

"I am sorry to disturb you," I said, "but I bring you news from your brother. He is here. Quite close to us."

Sally bent forward, clenching an old handkerchief with which she had wiping her forehead.

"Where do you say he is?" she gasped.

"He is lying in this bed, looking me straight in the face."

"You are mad. Do you think I am Robert?"

"Oh, no. I always know a lady when I see her. I should be sorry to doubt your sex. But, although you are Mlle. Hortense Perrichon, you also are your own brother, or, rather, you have impersonated him. Is that clear?"

A knock fell on the door. It was the doctor, and I withdrew to the garden, after having asked him to signal to me the moment he had done with the woman.

My secretary was pacing the garden up and down.

"You allowed yourself to be nicely bluffed," I said to him. "Yes," I continued, "this woman bluffed you, and others as well. In the annals of crime it certainly is a record case. Her brother did not return to this country, and, I dare say, died years ago. Sally performed a stroke of genius, coming to my office claiming my protection against him. With her short hair and wonderful likeness to him, she put on man's clothes, and then waited until I was away from Paris before calling at the office and introducing herself to you as Robert. You never thought that the gentleman who came to see you was Sally!

"Once Robert's existence was established, Sally knew she could with perfect safety carry out nefarious schemes, and change her sex the moment things became threatening. It was she who blackmailed that unfortunate M. F——.

"When Berard came to me this morning and related that wonderful story of Robert's ghostly appearance, I began to have an inkling of the truth. I do not believe in secret passages nor in miracles."

The doctor here called me and said that the woman was seriously ill, and I ordered her immediate removal to the Infirmary of the Depot X. (the Central Police Station).

Before going away she beckoned to me and whispered in my ear:

"The game is up. You found me out. Good-by."

They were the last words I heard her speak.

After she had gone I ransacked her room, and from the most impossible hiding-places brought to light securities, money, jewelry, men's clothes of every description. Among her correspondence I found several letters of M. F——; also a document relative to the death of Robert, three years before.

Sally had been struck down with enteric fever. When she recovered, the doctors declared that her mind was affected and that she could not be put on her trial. She was transferred to the St. Anne's Asylum, where she died hopelessly insane.

Curiously enough, there are still people who, having known Sally, refuse to believe she alone carried out such a bold scheme. They are convinced that Robert was not a myth at the time, and that he and his sister had been plotting together.

1912 BIG ORE YEAR

IRON OUTPUT FROM NORTH LIKELY TO SURPASS THE 1912 RECORD.

48,500,000 TONS IN 1912.

General Tendency Seems to Be to Increase the Production in Every Possible Way for Next Year.

Duluth.—As large as were the shipments of iron ore from the Lake Superior region this year—in round numbers, 48,500,000 tons—the outgo in 1913 will be bigger still, judging from the preparations being made by the mining companies. The general tendency is to increase production, either by reopening idle properties or increasing working forces. On the old ranges, at least, the United States Steel corporation is not operating this winter as briskly as are some of the other concerns. This does not, however, indicate that the big company will not increase its shipments from the region as a whole; on the contrary, it is expected it will send out materially more ore than this year. This increase will come from the Mesaba range; more particularly, from the Great Northern properties. The lease to these holdings will be surrendered Jan. 1, 1915, in accordance with notice given months ago, and for this reason it is intended to operate with vigor the Hill mines already developed. No especial effort to enlarge production at other properties of the Steel corporation is therefore required.

Forces are Doubled.

On the Marquette range, the Cleveland Cliffs Iron company, the bigger operator in the district, has doubled its forces at the Cleveland Lake mine at Ishpeming, now working that property both night and day, and it is steadily adding names to the payrolls at the Negaunee and Maas mines at Negaunee. Previously, the Chase and the Princeton No. 2 had been restored to the active list. The Smith property at Gwinn and the Imperial at Michigamme, both also of the Cleveland Cliffs company and idle for months, are being made ready for mining. The Imperial produces a limonite ore of non-Bessemer grade which is in demand only in prosperous periods. Its neighboring property, the Ohio, closed for months, yields a product of similar description. It will resume operations in the spring, it is reported. The Ohio, is under lease to the Rogers-Brown interests.

Many New Mines.

On the Menomonie range, eight or ten new mines are being made ready for production, the most of these in the Iron River district, with the Crystal Falls district also represented, as well as the Commonwealth field, in Wisconsin. In the Gogebic country, the Newport Mining company of the Schlesinger interests of Milwaukee is especially active. It has shafts sinking at the Palms and Anvil to open ore bodies and it is operating its big Newport on a vigorous scale, needing additions to its already big working forces there. Probably two properties, and perhaps others, will be added to the list of Vermillion range shippers next season. The new Cuyuna district will have several additions to its producers, among these the Hanna company's Barrows mine and the Adams property near Deerwood. Production on the Mesaba will break all previous records in 1913.

Dissatisfaction among the 650 men employed at the Breitung company's Mary Charlotte mine at Negaunee has been removed by the concession of a minimum wage scale for the contract miners.

Business for Crushing Plants.

While the Breitung interests are doing the most of their mining in the Negaunee field, they are operating the Baron mine at Humboldt, Marquette range. The Baron produces a non-Bessemer ore of the hard variety. A crushing plant has been erected and all of the output of the mine is now put through it. Nearly all the hard ores produced in the Marquette country are crushed before being shipped to the furnaces. The Cleveland Cliffs company has a fine new plant at its Cliffs Shafts mine at Ishpeming. The Lake Superior Iron company, a subsidiary of the Steel corporation, has a crusher at the Section Sixteen property at Ishpeming and a similar plant of larger capacity at Escanaba, this latter also treating the product of the Dober mine, Menominee range. At Negaunee the Cleveland Cliffs company has a crusher at its South Jackson property, at which the product of both that mine and the Moro property at Ishpeming is handled. M. A. Hanna & Co.'s Richmond mine, in the Cascade district, has one crusher and is to install a second in order that ore crushed still finer may be sent out.

Bank Officials Swindled.

Fairmont.—Officers of the First National bank of Ceylon, this county, say they have been swindled out of $6,000 by a smooth stranger calling himself John Carr of Fairbanks, Alaska, in a manner creditable to a J. Rufus Wallingford. The man came here a month ago and negotiated with B. H. Ward of Minneapolis for a stock of general merchandise at Ceylon owned by Mr. Ward. To finance the deal he produced a certificate of deposit on the First National bank of Fairbanks, Alaska, for $6,000.

CENSURES EXPENSES.

State Public Examiner Criticizes Practice of Employees Hiring and Paying Other Help.

St. Paul.—Two state government branches, the highway commission and Fire Marshal Charles E. Keller's office, are criticized in reports submitted to the governor today by Public Examiner Andrew E. Fritz in regard to their expenditures of money, though he adds that in each case the office accounts are well kept.

Both departments are censured for permittting subordinates to hire and pay other persons for services and reimbuse themselves from the state treasury, and highway department engineers for hiring their own relatives. The highway commission is said to be "very liberal" in its allowance of expense money to engineers. The fire marshal, it is said, has almost used up all available funds by paying expenses of arson prosecutions, when the amounts should be paid by the counties in which the crimes were committed.

"Allowance for expense bills for different engineers appears to be very liberal," says Mr. Fritz, discussing the highway commission's expenses. "I notice several instances where an engineer has been reimbursed for money paid for the services of his own relatives and the item for livery hire seems to be exceedingly high. One engineer is allowed $65.25 for using a team one month, exclusive of feed. In other departments no employee is allowed to pay his own help. The rule that any one entitled to pay from the state for work done shall get his own check from the state treasurer ought to apply to every state department because it fixes responsibility upon the proper party for rendering a true bill."

In the itemized statement the amount for livery is $7,970.98.

"The commission upon motion," continues Mr. Fritz, "authorized the secretary to audit and approve the semi-monthly payrolls. This responsibility has by law been placed upon the chairman of the commission."

Mr. Fritz declares that fourteen of the fifty-three district and assistant engineers have not filed their bonds of $3,000 each as required by law. He remarks that road inspectors, road patrols and other employes ought to file oaths of office. In the fiscal year covered by this report, the department expended $107,439.74, of which $14,096.74 was used for office expenses and the remainder for the field work.

Mr. Fritz states that the fire marshal's department has exceeded its appropriation for maintenance over and above the receipts appropriated by the legislature of 1911. "By using up nearly all the balance of 1910, the fire marshal is now in far worse position financially than he was at the same time last year," says Mr. Fritz. "The state auditor's books gave him a credit balance of only $429.30 and no receipts to be expected before March 1. This situation might have been avoided by a careful estimate of all available resources and by the employment of a less number of regularly paid assistants. The fire marshal claims that conditions have been such as to warrant the heavy expense and that the result of his work speaks for itself, but a close examination of the expense vouchers reveals the fact that a great part of the expenses incurred in prosecuting arson cases should have been paid by the counties in which the crimes were committed. Evidently it is not the intention of the law that the cost of legal proceedings and prosecutions shall be borne by the fire marshal's department.

"I would respectfully repeat the recommendation made at the last examination that moneys should not be paid out by assistants or clerks for services rendered by a third party."

M'LEAN WINS ELECTION.

Court Decides Probate Judgeship Contest of Wabasha County.

Winona.—James E. McLean of Wabasha was legally elected to the probate judgeship of Wabasha county at the last general election, according to an opinion written and mailed by Judge Snow of Winona to the clerk of that county. It is said the matter will be carried to the supreme court.

McLean, according to the official canvass of the votes in Wabasha, was elected probate judge by 173 majority over Walter A. Munger, the incumbent, who contested on the ground that the names were not rotated on the ballots.

Judge Snow says, first, that the statute does not require the rotating of names where only two names appear on the ballot; and, second, that there is no evidence that the will of the voters was not fully expressed in the total figures.

McLean Legally Elected.

Winona.—James E. McLean of Wabasha was legally elected to the probate judgeship of Wabasha county at the last general election, according to an opinion written by Judge Snow of Winona.

Asks Return of Marriage Fee.

Minneapolis.—Wolf Altagen, sixty years of age, heavily bearded and bent with his years, sought to recover $2.50 that he paid for his marriage license Monday, when he thought he would marry Divora Berinsky, 52 years old. "I want to wait a little while," Altagen explained to Deputy Clerk Ed Goff, through the aid of an interpreter. "My girl says she is not ready to marry yet and when she is I will come back and buy another license." But the deputy explained that a marriage license once sold stays sold.

GREAT INDIAN COUNCIL.

Chippewas of Minnesota Will Organize to Protect Interests and Obtain Rights.

Cass Lake.—At a general council of Chippewa Indians on the Fond du Lac reservation, resolutions were adopted constituting the council a working body for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the Chippewas in Minnesota. All chiefs, leaders and head men on all the Chippewa reservations in Minnesota were invited to attend a convention, or great council to be held at Cass Lake, on Feb. 4, for the purpose of organizing the Chippewas of Minnesota into a corporate body, to enable them to act in unison to protect their property and obtain their dues from the government.

It was suggested that members of each reservation call a council immediately and choose delegates to attend the convention. It is proposed that a constitution and by-laws be adopted to govern the body to be created. This corporate body will have permanent headquarters selected by the convention and will be represented by commissioners from each of the several reservations in Minnesota, who will be chosen for a term of years.

The work in contemplation is the settlement of all old treaties yet in dispute by the Chippewas upon any of the reservations in Minnesota and to aid the government in administering the Rice treaty, under the act of Jan. 14, 1889, so as to carry out all of the promises of the Chippewa commission. The Indians will also suggest to the Indian office modification of rules and regulations not in harmony with the best interests of the Chippewas, and urge the enactment by congress of new laws which will carry into effect the principles of citizenship.

CEYLON BANK SWINDLE.

Stranger Gets $5,500 by Means of Fraudulent Certificate of Deposit.

Ceylon, Minn.—It has come to light that the First National bank of this village has been swindled out of more than $5,000 by a "sharper" who came here about a month ago and bought a mercantile business from B. H. Ward of Minneapolis, which that gentleman had secured in exchange for land. The stranger gave his name as John Carr, and claimed that he had come from Fairbanks, Alaska.

The swindle was worked by means of a certificate of deposit on the First National bank of Fairbanks, Alaska, the bank here accepting it without investigation. Carr then paid $500 down and received a telegram stating that his wife, while on her way here from Alaska, had been taken ill at Seattle. He departed at once for her bedside.

Before going he drew all of the $5,500 he had in the bank except $5, and disappeared. He had been absent about two weeks before the bank suspected that all was not straight with the alleged Carr.

Investigations were then set on foot which revealed the startling facts that no such person had ever lived at Fairbanks, Alaska, that there had never been any money in the bank there to the credit of such a person, and that so far as could be learned no woman named Mrs. John Carr had been ill at Seattle.

The Shakopee Boosters club was reorganized and will be known as the Shakopee Commercial club. The following officers were elected: President, Henry Mergens; vice president, John B. Ries; secretary, W. N. Southworth; treasurer, John Theim; directors, Joseph C. Berens, Henry Mergens, John B. Ries, Joseph A. Ring, John Theim, W. N. Southworth and William F. Duffy.

Judicial Reforms Studied.

St. Paul, Jan. 4.—The commission appointed by Governor Eberhart to consider a scheme for reform in judicial procedure met in the supreme court and made their plans. The meeting was executive. Governor Eberhart presided and outlined the reforms he desired. The commission has been flooded with suggestions from lawyers and litigants. Many were worthless, but some are to be considered. To expedite cases in their progress from the lower to the higher court is the principal thing desired by Governor Eberhart.

Hills Won't Aid Plan.

Minneapolis.—Mr. James J. Hill, Louis Hill and President Carl Gray of the Great Northern railroad, definitely and deliberately turned down a proposal of the Civic and Commerce association to co-operate in the erection of a union station in Minneapolis. The Great Northern officials indicated a willingness to co-operate to a certain extent if a dual station plan were projected, but the terminal facilities committee is of the opinion that a union station in fact is the only solution to the traffic problem.

ODD TURK RELIGION

Whirling Dervishes Inflict Wounds on Selves.

Men of Ottoman Country Work Themselves Into a Frenzy and Then Use Various Instruments of Torture to Please Allah.

Constantinople.—The religion of the Ottoman empire is typical of its people—barbarous and fantastic. The Dervishes, the regular religious order in Turkey, recognize no authority but that of Allah, and, in consequence, have been persecuted not a little by the jealous Sultans. Although the laymen who profess this faith have but to repeat one or two short prayers and wear the sacred cap for a few minutes every day, those who take the vows of poverty, abstinence from wine, and celibacy, from time to time perform strange rites in their worship of Allah.

The Whirling Dervishes, after a few preliminaries, begin to chant the Koran to weird music played on flutes and tarboukas, which seems to intoxicate them. One by one they close their eyes, stretch their arms horizontally and begin to twist, slowly at first, but gain speed until they seem, like a sleeping top, to be motionless. All the time they never touch, although there may be a score of more whirling at the same time in the center of the floor, never leave the spot where they stand, and never get out of time, always moving to the music. This they continue until they fall exhausted and are covered with a cloak until they have recovered.

The ceremonies performed by the Howling Dervishes, another sect, are quite as strange, and a great deal more barbarous even than those just mentioned, but in neither case are the rites performed secretly; for, unlike other Mohammedans, the Dervishes do not object to the "Christian dog" attending their places of worship, so long as he removes his shoes before he enters the "tekieh," or temple.

Round the walls of the hall used by the Howling Dervishes hang all sorts of cruel-looking implements—sharp darts, nippers, chains, pinchers and other weapons. These the devotees use to mortify their flesh when they have worked themselves up to a state of religious ecstasy and delirium. Faster and faster they move thier heads, higher and higher rises the music, one by one the Dervishes leave their place and begin to leap high in the air, nodding all the time. Kettledrums are beaten, the chanting becomes louder. The Dervishes form a chain, placing their hands on each other's shoulders, then step one pace backward and one forward with a terrific simultaneous lurch, emitting a long-drawn howl, like the cry of some wounded animal.

Type of Dervishes of the Desert.

The excitement is intense, and the Dervishes, foaming at the mouth, begin to wound themselves with various implements from the walls. They handle redhot irons, fill their mouths with burning charcoal, drive a spit right through one cheek and out the other side, and leave it there while they continue to nod and howl. They perform a sort of wild dance with a pointed dart in each hand, throwing themselves upon them, until, worn out, they roll over, covered with blood and foam.

While this is going on mothers bring their children for the priest to stand upon, for in so doing he is supposed to cure all diseases. Tiny children undergo this ordeal, and are forced to bear the pressure until their ribs crack and their eyes bulge from their livid faces. Even those of the highest rank come to be stood upon by the imam, or high priest, believing that it will cure them of their illnesses.

TOLD HER LIFE'S AMBITION

Small Girl Somewhat Crudely Expressed Her Desire to Be a Teacher When She Grew Up.

At one time or another during the ward school life of a little girl there prevails the ambition to become a teacher. Perhaps it is the indisputable authority possessed by the hand that wields the ruler or the nonchalant display of wisdom on topics surrounded by the most inaccessible difficulties to the small boy and girl. They will nearly always tell their ambitions to a well-liked teacher, and one rather surprising declaration was given by a little maid in one of Miss Clara Townsend's room before she became principal of the James school.

Among the special favors coveted by the youngsters is the permission to stay behind after school and clean the blackboards. One evening a little girl was given the desired privilege, and while engaged in the task she struck up a shy sort of conversation with Miss Townsend. Finally the usual confession was made.

"When I grow up, I am going to be a teacher," she announced.

"That so?" pleasantly asked Miss Townsend. "And why do you want to be a teacher?"

"Well," was the rather surprising answer, "I'll have to be either a teacher or a lady, and I would rather be a teacher."—Indianapolis News.

Shopper's Cramp.

Simeon Ford, at a dinner of hotel men in New York, discussed a new disease.

"There's a new disease called shopper's cramp," he said. "It appears early in December, becomes violently epidemic about the middle of the month and ends suddenly on the evening of the 24th.

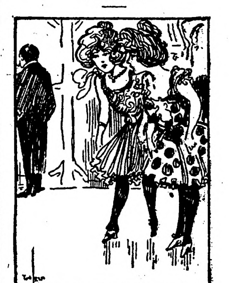
"Women feel shopper's cramp in the arms, the limbs, everywhere; but it attacks the husband only in one place—the pocket."

Which?

"Have you had much experience in hooking up?"

"Horses or waists?"

LOGICAL.



"The manager always keeps back a portion of the villain's salary."

"Why does he do that—afraid he'd skip?"

"No; but he always acts his part better when he's mad."

"From your druggist get two ounces of Glycerine and half an ounce of Globe Pine Compound (Concentrated Pine). Take these two ingredients home and put them into a half pint of good whiskey. Shake well. Take one to two teaspoonfuls after each meal and at bed time. Smaller doses to children according to age." This is said to be the quickest cough and cold cure known to the medical profession. Be sure to get only the genuine Globe Pine Compound (Concentrated Pine). Each half ounce bottle comes in a tin screw-top sealed case. If your druggist is out of stock he will quickly get it from his wholesale house. Don't fool with uncertain mixtures. It is risky. Local druggists say that for the past six years this has had a wonderful demand. Published by the Globe Pharmaceutical laboratories of Chicago.

NATURALIZING HIM.

Problem in Physics.

A native of T., on the coast of Scotland, when the contract for the building of the first three steamers fitted with electric lights at the local shipyard was completed, formed one of the social party gathered to entertain the electricians, says Ideas. In a burst of candor and comradeship, he was heard to say to one of the wiremen:

"Mon, Peter, efter workin' wi' you on they boats, I believe I could put in the electric licht masel', but there's only one thing that bates me."

"Aye, aye, Sandy, what is that?" inquired his interested friend, willing to help him if it lay in his power.

"Weel, mon," replied Sandy, "'tis just this: I dinna ken hoo ye get the ile tae alang the wires."

He's Not a Chicken Fancier.

Speaking of chickens a funny man writing in Puck says:

"They are the most dadbusted, uncertainest creatures that walk the family acre. Almost everybody tries to raise chickens at one time or another. Looks easy—that's the deceiving part of it.

"And it is easy after you learn one thing. Little chickens don't know anything, medium sized chickens don't know anything, large sized chickens don't know anything. If there is any change of an intellectual nature as the size increases the big ones know less if possible than the little ones.

"If there is a wire partition in your pen with an open door at one end the chickens will try to plunge through the wire instead of going around and walking through the door."

Fire in Bank of England.

The first fire within memory occurred at the Bank of England, London, a few days ago. The fire broke out in the southeastern portion of the building. The flooring and joisting were considerably damaged. The outbreak was discovered by the Bank of England authorities and subdued by their own appliances in 30 minutes. A lieutenant and a dozen men of the Irish Guards on duty at the bank, with fixed bayonets, assisted the police in keeping the crowd back from the building.

BOLD AUTO BANDITS

HAVE FIERCE REVOLVER BATTLE WITH POLICE IN HEART OF CHICAGO.

SMASH JEWELER'S GLASS

Woman Faints in Arms of Policeman and Aids the Men to Escape —Officer is Shot and Stabbed.

Chicago, Jan. 6.—Four automobile bandits smashed in a jeweler's window here and escaped with a tray of diamonds, after a running revolver fight with police, punctuated by spectacular features. Their escape was aided by a fashionably dressed woman, who fainted in the arms of a uniformed policeman as he was drawing his revolver. As soon as the theieves were out of sight the woman recovered and disappeared.

A few minutes later the bandits' car was boarded by a policeman, who ordered them to drive to a police station for speeding. They wheeled into a quiet street, with the policeman and there shot, stabbed and slugged him and threw him off the car.

The men abandoned their automobile which had been stolen just before the robbery and disappeared in a crowded section of the West Side.

Thrilling Fight.

The raid and running fight was one of the most thrilling of the automobile bandit outrages in the recent prevalence of this type of crime in this city.

The thieves stole the car from in front of a downtown business building late in the afternoon. A short time later passers in front of a Clark street jewelry store were startled by the crash of glass. Two men were beating in the show window with bricks. They seized a tray of rings and leaped to the running board of an automobile that was moving slowly by the curb.

Policeman Charles Hanson ran up reaching for his revolver, but at that moment a woman with a large feathered hat gave a shriek and threw herself into his arms. Hanson could not draw his weapon, but two policemen in plain clothes who were passing, opened fire on the thieves. The bandits returned the fire as they climbed into the car, and one of the thieves was seen to fall into a seat and is thought to have been wounded.

Twenty shots were exchanged as the machine gathered speed. The chauffeur manipulated his exhaust so that it poured out a cloud of smoke, which aided in the escape. The plain clothes policemen ran after the car and at the next corner commandeered a passing high powered automobile and ordered its chauffeur to pursue the thieves who, however, had so good a start they escaped.

The bandits' car was stopped by Policeman Charles Sticken in a traffic jam a few blocks from the scene of the robbery. Sticken arrested the chauffeur for speeding.

"Jump in, old man, and we'll take you to the station house," one of the men said to Sticken.

The policeman stood on the running board and told the way to go. The chauffeur took a wrong turn into La Salle avenue. Stricken turned to protest and received a stab with a knife over the left eye, a blow on the back of the head and a shot in the leg, and was hurled from the car.

The thieves fired several more shots at Sticken as he lay in the street. He raised himself on one elbow and drew his revolver and fired several times at the fleeing car. The thieves fired several more shots at Sticken and also turned their revolvers on citizens they passed in their flight. None of these were struck by bullets.

Wood Urges Army Changes.

Washington, Jan. 6.—The restoration of the army canteen and enactment of legislation for the elimination from the United States army of unfit officers are among the principal recommendations of Major General Leonard Wood, chief of staff, in his annual report. General Wood likewise recommends the concentration of the army on stragetic lines and in areas where it can be more economically maintained, and would transfer most of the personnel of the staff corps to the line.

ISLANDS WANT INDEPENDENCE

URGE REPRESENTATIVE TO WORK FOR IT.

Jones Measure Would Give Islands the Right to Rule Themselves After Eight Years.

Washington, Jan. 6.—Cabled instructions from the Philippine general assembly to work for passage of the Jones bill to provide for Philippine independence, with a view to action at this session if possible, and failing that to press it before the extra session, have been received by Delegate Quezon of the Philippines.

Mr. Quezon is not very hopeful of having the matter brought up before the extra session when, he has been told, it might be put through congress as a Democratic measure. Mr. Quezon, who has just returned from the islands, says the Philippine assembly and every town in the archipelago have endorsed the Jones bill.

The bill purposes to establish a provisional government, more liberal and autonomous at present, for a probationary period of eight years, beginning July 4, 1913, and that after July 4, 1921, the United States shall relinquish all rights of sovereignty over the Philippines and grant to its inhabitants full independence.

The United States would retain sovereignty over necessary naval and coaling station sites and terminal points for cables, not including the bay and harbor of Manila, which would be left to the Filipinos. Other deep water harbors, equally susceptible of fortifications and defense, such as Subig Bay, would be considered for naval basis and coaling sites.

The Jones bill also would provide that the Philippine government should carry out the obligations of the United States with Spain; that no law should be enacted discriminative against citizens of the United States, as compared with those of the Philippines or other countries. It also would test the legislative power of the Philippine islands in a congress of the Philippines, a senate comprising 38 members and a house of 87 members.

The executive power would be vested during the probationary period in a president, appointive for four years by the president of the United States and after July 4, 1921, to be elective by the Filipinos.

FUNERAL OF MR. REID

Impressive Services Are Held ta the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York.

New York, Jan. 4.—Funeral services for Whitelaw Reid, late ambassador to England, who died in London, were held at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine this morning. The ceremony was most impressive and among those attending were President Taft, many members of the diplomatic corps in Washington and others prominent in public life.

Bishop Greer officiated and was assisted by Rev. Dr. William M. Grosvenor, dean of the cathedral, who was one of Mr. Reid's closest friends for many years. Mr. Reid was a parishioner formerly in the Church of the Incarnation, over which Dr. Grosvenor used to preside.

Why He Resigned.

Mitchell, S. D., Jan. 6.—Edward E. Wagner, whose resignation as United States district attorney for South Dakota has been accepted, stated he had resigned because Attorney General Wickersham had asked him to make request of Federal Judge Elliott that commitment in the case of Charles L. Hyde be withheld for 60 days. Hyde was wealthy and had been imprisoned for 15 months.

Archbold Trial Again.

Washington, Jan. 6.—The senate sitting as a court of impeachment in the trial of Judge Robert W. Archbold of the commerce court has convened again after a lapse of more than two weeks. The trial was scheduled to be resumed Friday, but the sudden death of Senator Jeff Davis of Arkansas, and the subsequent adjournment of the senate, as a mark of respect, precluded any session. A. S. Worthington, Judge Archbold's chief counsel, said the jurist would take the witness stand in his own behalf.

FOUND WORKS OF STEVENSON

Manuscripts and Works of Popular Writer Unearthed in Samoa and Hawaii, by an Admirer.

It is learned that a number of new and relatively important manuscripts of Robert Louis Stevenson have been discovered in Samoa and in Honolulu by an ardent admirer of the great novelist, who has been for some time in both Hawaii and Samoa seeking such writings of the famous Scotsman as might possibly be found in the possession of some of the many friends of Stevenson during his years in the Pacific.

The result of this research has been the finding of an essay, said to be highly poetical in character, written by the novelist after witnessing a volcano in action, supposedly either the famed crater of Savaii or the pit of Kilauea in Hawaii; a piece of fiction dealing with South sea life, and a number of smaller verse compositions.

Still another manuscript, a blank verse relation of a well-known legend of Maui, of considerable length, but unfinished, has also come to light, and the enthusiastic admirer of Stevenson feels highly rewarded for his month of effort.

SKIN ERUPTION ON CHEEK

Kingsley, Mich.—"Last May my thirteen-months-old baby had a sore come on her cheek. It started in four or five small pimples and in two or three hours' time spread to the size of a silver dollar. It spread to her eye. Then water would run from the pimples and wherever that touched it caused more sores until nearly all one cheek and up her nostrils were one solid sore. She was very fretful. She certainly was a terrible looking child, and nothing seemed to be of any use.

"Then I got some Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. She tried to rub off everything we put on so that we would sit and hold her hands for two hours at a time, trying to give the medicine a chance to help her, but after I washed it with Cuticura Soap and then put on the Cuticura Ointment they seemed to soothe her and she did not try to rub them off. It was only a few days before her face was all healed up, and there has been no return of the trouble since. We thought that baby's face would surely be scarred, but it is not." (Signed) Mrs. W. J. Cleland, Jan. 5, 1912.

Cuticura Soap and Ointment sold throughout the world. Sample of each free, with 32-p. Skin Book. Address post-card "Cuticura, Dept. L, Boston." Adv.

Pooh, Pooh, Bro. Mussey!

In conning our exchanges we notice that nowadays we quite frequently see favorable comment on some action of President Taft.s. We wonder if its due to his near retirement from office, or is it that the people are more ready to appreciate the mental criliber of the man.

An effort will be made to amend that drainage law this winter, which will give some of our representatives in the legislature an opportunity to show their friendship for the interests of the farmers. The amendments are being prepared now, and will be introduced as soon as the legislature gets down to business.—Sunbeam.

The state legislature met on Monday and proceeded to get right down to business. There was some excitement in the senate over the attempt to take the committee appointments away from the lieutenant gouernor. but it subsided after the effort of the machine had been defeated. It is good to know that the senate this year may not be altogether controled by the interests.

Heavy frost on Tuesday morning destroyed practically all of the California orange crop and the loss is estimated at between thirty and forty mrllions of dollars. Here in northern Minnesota frost does not hurt to that extent no matter how cold it gets. The worst feature of this California Frost is that we will probably have to go without oranges part of the time and pay a pretty stiff price for those we do have.

You hear much talk, especially in the cities, to the effect that twenty to forty acres is a big enough farm, when worked right. This does not work out in practice. A few gardners in the district surrounding the big cities can do that but if ten per cent of she farmers in the stat should go into gardening the market would be hopelessly flooded. Farming consists mainly of raising grain and stock, and eighty acres is about the least that will pay for either purpose.—Warroad Pioneer.

HOW MOOSE JAW WAS NAMED

Reminder of the Way in Which a Pioneer Fifty Years Ago Mended a Wheel.

Moose Jaw is a strange name for a city, and it may be of interest to know how such a name was given. Some fifty years ago, so the story goes, a pioneer with his team of oxen and "prairie schooner," while passing along the banks of the river, was obliged to camp at this point, in Saskatchewan, on account of an accident to his cart, as a spoke had fallen apart. He looked round for something to insert for a temporary brace for the wheel, while his wife busied herself with the evening meal.

The pioneer's child, while romping around, found the jawbone of a moose, which she held up to her father, who by this time almost despaired of finding something with which to mend his wagon, and was delighted to find that the jawbone exactly fitted the place of the missing spoke. The Indians thereafter named this part of the river "The Place Where the White Man Found the Moose Jaw." This accounts for the town's unforgettable name.—London Standard.

WARM TRIBUTE.

It was in a little country town in the west of England, says the Bristol Mirror, and Mr. Goodman, excellent citizen and kind-hearted man, allowed himself, much against his own will, to be chosen mayor for the fourth time. After the event, he met Mr. Jones, one of his warmest admirers, who shook him heartily by the hand.

"I'm right sorry, Mr. Mayor," said the worthy man, "they've putten on you the trouble of officiating for another term, with all your many calls and worries of business; a far worse would have suited us—but that just the trouble. We couldn't find him—and it's my opinion as he ain't to be found."

MANY WIZARDS IN MOROCCO

French Will Have Hard Time Eradicating the Belief in Witchcraft in That Country.

There is no country in the world where witchcraft is so deeply implanted as in Morocco, and to eradicate it will be the most difficult task that the French, in their endeavors to open up the country to European trade and civilization, will have to face. The talebs are so thoroughly convinced of the truth of their practices and doctrines that they even attempt to convert educated Europeans. Dr. Mauchamp himself, as M. Jules Bois relates, was approached by these maitres des tenebres with that object in view. In the hope of making a convert of the French hakim they told him of the methods which they employed to injure and even to kill the enemies of their clients. Finding that their task was hopeless, and that the young savant was questioning them merely with the object of satisfying his curiosity, they finally turned against him and signed his death warrant, for there can be no doubt that his assassination was directly due to the perfidious maneuvers of the wizards of Marrakech.

PUZZLE.

Head Coach Howe told at the Yale training table a football story.

"The English," he began, "are crazier over football than we are. Why, there will sometimes be nearly 100,000 English at a single football game.

"Two Englishwomen of the lower class were drinking 'four-ale' in a 'pub' one afternoon.

"'What's the matter with 'ee, Bess?' said the first woman.

"'Ah'm puzzled,' said the second.

"'What about, Bess?'

"'Well, ye see, my Garge's on the football team, an' when the team wins he treats me to fried fish an' the movies, but when it loses he gies me a beatin' up.'

"'Well, Bess, I know all about that. But what's puzzlin' thee? That's what I asked.'

"'Well, ye see, today's match ended in a draw.'"

REAL HEIGHT OF LIONS.

Three feet or a little over is the real height of good sized lions and tigers. And when sportsmen realize what an extra six inches or nine inches added to the stature involves in increased length and general bulk to balance the known proportions of the animals I am equally sure they will admit that no lion ever scaled anything like four feet at the shoulder and that the height measurements of dead specimens give quite a false idea of the actual heights of the animals in life. The following are the heights at the shoulders of some of our large felidae: Large lioness, two feet eleven inches; Manchuria tigress, two feet nine inches; Nepal tigress, two feet eight inches; Sumatran tiger, two feet seven inches; large male jaguar, two feet three inches; male cheetah, two feet two inches.—London Field.

DOMESTIC BOMBSHELL.

There is a tale told in every big house party in Ireland about an incident in the seventies. A peer and peeress in their own country house were seated at lunch with their daughter, who was not on the best of terms with them, when she broke a long silence by observing:

"Mother, I was married this morning."

The peeress bore the news with a severe aspect, and observed, in chilling tones:

"At least, before telling such a private matter, you might wait until James (the footman) leaves the room."

"But, mother, it is James I married!"

Holt Bank Is Prosperous

The annual meeting of stockholders of the Holt State Bank was held at the bank on Tuesday and Wednesday and officers elected for the ensuing year as follows.

President—D. B. Bakke.
Vice-Pres.—R. Reierson.
Cashier—B. L. Backe.
Directors—H. Loken, E. O. Gullinsrud, D. B. Bakke, R. Reierson, B. L Backe.
Discount County—D. B. Bakke, R. Reierson, B. L Backe.
Examining Committee—C. H. Gunheim, R. Reierson, H. Loken.

The net earnings of the bank for the past year amounted to almost 20 per cent. A dividend of 10 per cent was declared; 5 per cent was set aside as surplus, and the remainder was placed in the undivided profits column. Few of the newer banks in the state can make a better showing than this.

Knut Nelson and Charles Holmgren were in from Mud Lake yesterday selling grain and shopping.

Quite numper of the local fans went down to Thief River Falls Tuesday to take in the Curtis-Francis wrestling match. They say it was a good one, Curtis winning in two straigh falls.

Messrs Stevens and Lumpkin, of the Merchants National Bank of Crookston, were business visitors here on Monday. They were looking up some gilt-edged investments for their bank funds and found some to suit them here.

We understand that an extension [illegible] Northwestern Drainage Co., on their Mud Lake drainage contract. This would make their contract for the Marshall County part of the work expire with the present year, and it is to be hoped that they will improve on their efforts to live up to their agreement.

Psychic Message Brings Relief for Widow and Orphan Children

Our readers will readily recall the sudden death of Carsten Gronwald a few weeks ago. He was found unconscious in the road one morning after a trip to Middle River and died a few hours later. He left a widow and several small children in hard circumstances, but they have obtained relief through the finding of quite a large sum of money which the dead man had hidden away. The hiding place of the money was told in a letter from one John Gunderson who is now living in Saskatchewan, but who formerly lived northeast of here near Thief Lake, and was generally believed to be the possessor of supernatural powers.

Mrs Gronwald knew that her husband had had considerable money a short time before his death, but no trace of it could be found afterwards. On the advice of a friend she wrote to Gunderson and asked his help. On Friday she received a letter from him stating that the money was hidden away in three places; some in the barn, some under the kitchen roof and some in the cellar. The hiding places were described in detail, and the money was found in the exact places described. The total amounted to $715. Gunder P. Sorter, a near neighbor, assisted the woman in the search, and deposited the money for her in the Holt State Bank next day.

It is several years since Gunderson left here for his present home in Saskatchewan, and he had no way of knowing about this matter until Mrs. Gronwald wrote him. That he had the ability to penetrate the secrets of the dead is proved by his letter and the tangible result in the form of the money in the bank.

In the letter Gunderson also gave information pointing to foul play in connection with Gronwald's death, and we will give further particulars in our next issue.

Dr. J. T. Turley, Dentist, will make his next visit to Holt on January 18-19. See his "ad."

E. A. Hjertos, postmaster and merchant of Middle River, died at Grand Forks on Friday last after a brief illness from an abscess of the brain. The remains were brought home for interment and the funeral was held on Monday last and very largely attended.

Word has been received here from Thief River Falls that little Walmer Risberg had to undergo another operation for the tuberculoses in his leg, and that he is in a very critical condition. This is not good news to the people of Holt, all of whom are fond of little "Riley" and hope that he will pull through all right.

The Munson-Ring wrestling match here last Friday night was one of the really interesting events of the season and resulted in a clean victory for Munson. Owing to the bad weather the attendance was not very large but all who attended express themselves as well pleased with the wrestling and the dance afterwards.

Jan. 15th—No visiting since our last writing on the account of the weather being a little too cold.

IT'S CONCENTRATION

A FAMOUS FINANCIER ADMITS GREAT MERGERS OF FINANCIAL ORGANIZATIONS.

"HAS GONE FAR ENOUGH"

Says Conditions Are Not Entirely "Comfortable for Country"—No Present Harm.

Washington, Jan. 13.—The present concentration of money and credit "has gone far enough;" "in bad hands" it would have a bad effect upon the nation; the "safety of the situation lies in the personnel of the men in control," and present conditions are not entirely "comfortable for the country."

These were a few of the statements made by George F. Baker, master financier, as the climax of two days' examination before the house money trust committee. But Mr. Baker declared that "bad hands" could not retain the control.

Beyond Usual Hour.

The statements, coming at the end of a day of routine examination, during which Mr. Baker reviewed in detail the operations of himself, his bank, the First National bank of New York, and J. P. Morgan & Co., in the issuance of bonds, startled the committee and Mr. Baker's counsel, Fisher A. Baker and John C. Spooner. The committee went beyond its usual hour of adjournment in order to conclude the examination of Mr. Baker.

Samuel Untermyer, counsel for the committee, was wading through a mass of heavy statistics relating to bond issues, handled by Mr. Baker's associates. Suddenly he paused, and shot a question at the 73-year-old financier, who, despite his long examination, was cheerful and confident.

"Mr. Baker, I suppose you do not think there is a money trust?" the lawyer demanded.

All Sit Forward.

Committee, spectators and counsel sat forward in their chairs as the hearing room, but a moment since dull and stolid, grew tense with expectation. The witness leaned back in his chair, smiled quietly about him, and replied:

"I do not think there is."

"What do you understand by a money trust?" Mr. Untermyer continued.

"I give it up; I don't know," Mr. Baker said, with a chuckle.

"Suppose," Mr. Untermyer said, "we define a money trust as an established identity and community of interest between a few leaders of finance, which has been created and is held together through stockholdings, interlocking directorates and other forms of domination over banks, trust companies, railroads, public service and industrial corporations and which has resulted in vast and growing concentration and control of money and credit in the hands of a comparatively few men. Taking that definition, is there any doubt of the fact that there has been of late years a vast and growing concentration of credit in the hands of a few men?"

Money Concentrated.

"Well, there is a great amount of money that has come together here, more or less concentrated," Mr. Baker replied, after a pause.

"There have been great mergers of financial institutions, have there not?" Mr. Untermyer asked.

"Yes, sir."

Here Mr. Untermyer reviewed some of the recent combinations of financial institutions in New York.

"And there have been a great number of these consolidations in various parts of the country" the lawyer continued.

"Yes," Mr. Baker responded.

"I suppose you would see no harm," Mr. Untermyer said, "in having the control of credit as represented by the control of banks and trust companies still further concentrated. Do you think that would be dangerous?"

Mr. Baker pondered the question for a time and then answered:

"I think it has gone about far enough."

"Do you think it would be dangerous to go farther?"

"It might not be dangerous, but still it has gone about far enough. In good hands, I don't say that it would do any harm. If it got into bad hands, it would be very bad."

Trying to Settle Strike.

New York, Jan. 13.—Except for a mass meeting there were few activities in the garment workers' strike, which involves 125,000 workers and has been in progress since Jan. 1. It is announced that 60,000 men and women will march in a parade today. Samuel Gompers, president and Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, are in the city and it is reported they are engaged in conference with the strike leaders, seeking to arrange a settlement.

TURKS MAY QUIT CONFERENCE

WAR LIKELY TO BE RESUMED ON THRACIAN FIELDS.

Allies Prepared to Sacrifice 5,000 in Taking Adrianople, if Need Be.

London, Jan. 14.—The British secretary of state for foreign affairs, Sir Edward Grey, and the ambassadors of the powers have made representations to Rechad Pasha regarding the projected departure of the Turkish delegates—which is equivalent to a definite rupture of the peace negotiations, for which Turkey is considered responsible.

In reply, Rechad Pasha said that he was not responsible for the suspension of the work of the conference, which was decreed by the allies, not only without asking his opinion, but without even allowing him to express it when he begged to do so.

He has waited a week, hoping that reflection would bring the allies to more reasonable and moderate views, but as no move had been made on their part in this direction and no desire had been manifested to hear what further rectification of the frontier Turkey was prepared to indicate—naturally without ceding Adrianople—the Turkish plenipotentiaries could not remain in London indefinitely.

In deference to England, which has treated them so hospitably, and out of regard for the other powers, whose ambassadors regretted the rupture of the negotiations, Rechad Pasha consented to telegraph to Constantinople asking definite instructions.

The allies also are tired of waiting. They do not believe the note which the powers will present to Constantinople will have the desired effect, but, not wishing to take a decisive step without due notice to Europe, they have notified Sir Edward Grey and the ambassadors of their intention to denounce the armistice contemporaneously with or shortly after, the presentation of the note to the porte.

The allies will be ready to resume the war four days later. In fact, it is remarked that Greece has never ceased hostilities; that Servia has nothing more to conquer, while with respect to Montenegro, the armistice has never been observed by Turkey, whose soldiers have made frequent sorties from Scutari.

Therefore, the resumption of hostilities really concerns only the Thracean field of operations, where the activity of the allies seems to be limited to the conquest of Adrianople. The Balkan military experts here think that under present conditions Adrianople can be taken in a few days by the sacrifice of 5,000 men.

ENGLAND IS GALE-SWEPT

Lives Lost; Ships Wrecked; Transatlantic Liners Damaged; Small Crafts Sink.

London, Jan. 14.—The United Kingdom was swept Saturday and Sunday by heavy gales and snowstorms lasting 33 hours. There have been many wrecks of small craft and coast shipping has been considerably damaged.

Telephone and telegraph wires are down in all directions. The steamer Mauretania was held alongside the landing stage at Liverpool until she sailed direct for New York. The steamer Celtic from New York, Jan. 4, which arrived at Queenstown, reports having experienced terrific weather. The gale was so violent on Friday and Saturday that the passengers were forbidden on the promenade deck.

The Abyssinia signalled that she had met with an accident the nature of which, however is not disclosed. The German steamer Claus Horn reports having lost all her deck cargo and two blades of her propellor, but is proceeding to Bremen. The Danish steamer Gkoch has been wrecked off Girdleness, Scotland, with the loss of seven lives.

$100,000 Fire in Edmonton.

Edmonton, Alta., Jan. 14. — Fire, which broke out in Reed's bazaar store, for a time threatened an entire square in the central business district here. Owing to a broken water main, the firemen were unable to get a stream on the fire and a number of small buildings were torn down before the progress of the flames could be checked. Several people occupying flats in the upper part of the Reed building were nearly suffocated before being removed by the firemen. The loss was $100,000. It was 30 below zero.

Tracks Cleared in Cascades.

Seattle, Jan. 11.—All railroads report their transcontinental lines open with trains moving on their schedules. The Great Northern has cleared its track of snow which had blockaded the mountain division for nearly a week, and overland trains, which have been detoured over other roads since last Friday, are running over its own line. The Northern Pacific and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul lines report their lines clear and weather conditions favorable.

Further Shipping Evidence.

Washington, Jan. 11. — That the agreement entered into in 1908 in the Lamport and Holt, the Prince and the Hamburg-South American steamship companies, constituting the so-called "shipping trust" between the United States and South America, is still in force, except as it applies to a pooling of interests and rebate system on south bound commerce, was the testimony placed before the house merchant marine committee investigating the alleged trust.

FORTUNE TO WIDOW

VALUE OF ESTATE ESTIMATED AT FROM $10,000,000 TO $20,000,000.

WAS WRITTEN YEARS AGO

Son, Ogden, to Retain Control of Tribune if He "Displays Capacity," States the Codicil.

New York, Jan. 13.—The estate of the late Whitelaw Reid, ambassador to Great Britain, is left unconditionally to his widow, Mrs. Elizabeth Mills Reid, with the exception of specific bequests totaling $110,000, under the terms of the will, just made public.

Nothing for Children.

To Ogden Mills Reid and Jean Templeton Reid, now Mrs. John Hubert Ward, his son and daughter, there is left outright not a penny, although the late ambassador indicated unmistakeably his wish that they should be well provided for by their mother.

The value of the estate has been variously estomated at from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000. No hint of what the appraisal will show is given in the will, however. The widow is made sole executrix and special request is made that she may serve without giving bond. The will was executed in November, 1894.

Mrs. Reid thus becomes the owner of almost the entire stock of the Tribune association, publishers of the New York Tribune, whose affairs her son, Ogden Reid, has been directing for a year.

A statement issued by Henry W. Sackett, counsel for the estate, asserts that Ogden Reid will continue as the head of the association.

In Mrs. Reid's hands is placed the management of the entire estate, without hindrance or suggestion, further than the late ambassador's expressed wish that his son, Ogden, should he "display capacity and aptitude for the work," should "ultimately" succeed to the control of the Tribune, and that certain parcels of real estate should "ultimately" pass to his son and his daughter.

Will an Old One.

Ogden Mills Reid, whose ultimate control of the Tribune is thus described as being dependent upon the aptitude he should show for the work and his mother's wishes, was a boy in knickerbockers when the will was written. He is now somewhat under thirty.

The will was filed yesterday with the surrogate at White Plains, N. Y.

Stotesbury's Case Is Ended.

New York, Jan. 11. — The suit brought by Edward Stotesbury, the Philadelphia banker, against Oscar Hammerstein, to recover $39,960, resulted in no verdict. After four hours' deliberation the jury in the United States district court reported a disagreement and was discharged. Mr. Stotesbury contended that the money he sued to recover was a loan. Mr. Hammerstein held that it was a gratuitous contribution for the support of grand opera in Philadelphia.

CONSERVATIVE OPTIMISM FELT

COLD KILLS FRUIT AND BOOMS WEARING APPAREL.

Has Also Affected Quotations on Some Farm Products.

New York, Jan. 13.—Dun's Review of Trade says:

Business in nearly all departments continues very satisfactory, the volume of transactions making an imposing total as is evidenced by the week's statistics of bank clearings. There is a general feeling of conservative optimism. While the negotiations for peace in the Balkans are delayed the strain is lessening.

Favorable conditions in iron and steel are fully maintained. Production of pig iron continues at a high rate and what approaches a congestion of orders prevails in steel products. Labor troubles in the New York clothing trade produce more or less uncertainty in the various branches, but dry goods generally display activity.

Extreme cold weather has prevailed in many sections and damage to the fruit crops is reported. Foreign trade statistics continue to reflect the country's big commerce, both outward and inward.

In iron and steel, an advance of $2 a ton on steel plates has been announced by an independent interest, but the mills are so congested with business that no deliveries are promised for some time to come.

Bradstreet's Review.

Bradstreet's says:

There is more life in trade this week. The widespread cold wave, accompanied by snow and rain, had variable effects on retail trade, but on the whole it was beneficial, helping distribution of wearing apparel, shoes and rubber goods. In addition, the coal trade was benefited and the winter wheat crop, hitherto bare, received a fair snow covering.

On the other hand, the Western railways felt the retarding effect of the storm, and the coldest weather in 30 years in Southern California caused heavy damage. In the iron and steel industry, pig iron is slack and the railroads are out of the market for rails but specifications for cars and equipment are very large.

Cold weather has affected quotations of some farm products. On the exchanges the features are the appearance of more strength in the grains, but cotton is 30 points off on unloading by long holders.

Building at all cities probably broke all records last year.

Wheat, including exports from the United States and Canada, for the week ending Jan. 9, aggregate 5,661,944 bushels against 4,596,618 bushels last week and 2,560,821 bushels this week last year.

Corn exports for the week are 656,190 bushels against 1,362,606 bushels last week and 812,035 bushels in 1912.

Sixty Children Arrested.

St. Petersburg, Jan. 11.—A revolutionary plot, organized by children, has been discovered, it was declared by the police, when they arrested more than sixty boys and girls, pupils in secondary schools. The officials say the plot was directed against Minister of Education Caszo, whose administration has been bitterly criticized, and whose reactionary measures against the universities have caused many of Russia's leading instructors to resign. Most of the children under arrest are from middle class working families.

2,500 ARE HOMELESS

OHIO STILL RISING—INDIANA, OHIO AND KENTUCKY AFFECTED.

TOWNS ARE INUNDATED.

Lower Parts of Cincinnati and Suburbs Under Water—Danger in Louisville—Refugees Reach Indiana.

Cincinnati, Jan. 14.—The Ohio river has passed the 60-foot stage here and continues to rise steadily at the rate of two inches an hour.

In the lower parts of the city and in Dayton, Newport and Covington, suburbs across the river in Kentucky, 2,500 persons have been made temporarily homeless by the invading waters. In the Kentucky towns, schoolhouses and churches have been thrown open and are filled with refugees. The property loss will reach into the thousands.

Heavy Losses Suffered.

Cincinnati commission merchants and warehouse owners, whose places of business are along the river front, have suffered heavy losses. Hundreds of cellars have been flooded and in some buildings facing the wharves the water is up to the second story.

The flooded streets along the river on both the Ohio and Kentucky sides are filled with rowboats, skiffs and launches all day, carrying out refugees and their belongings.

Steamboat traffic on the river has been practically abandoned, the water being so high that many of the boats are unable to pass under the bridges. The swift current is a bar to upward stream traffic. The government forecaster predicts that the rise will continue for 30 hours, assuming a cessation of rain.

Hundreds Driven from Home.

Portsmouth, Ohio.—It is estimated that several hundred families have been driven from their homes by the flood here. Moving vans and all kinds of wagons operated all day long, carrying families and their belongings to safety.

The poorer class found refuge in the public school buildings.

Flood defenses are holding water out of the city proper, but the Broadway levee, which holds floods out of the East End, yesterday gave signs of yielding to pressure and was strengthened with sandbags.

Hundreds Driven Out.

Louisville, Ky.—Hundreds of families have been driven from their homes along the water front here during the past 24 hours by the rising waters of the Ohio.

A stage of 40 feet by Tuesday evening is predicted. This would put the water over the cut off embankment east of the city by Monday noon, flood an area of several miles, and render approximately 400 families homeless.

Refugees Reach Evansville.

Evansville, Ind.—Refugees from the surrounding submerged districts reached here in power boats and steamers. Tugs today will be sent into the flooded country to aid farmers in removing their families and livestock. The mercury reached 18 degrees above zero yesterday.

Reports from Indiana river towns indicate that refugees are reaching all of them.

FIRE LOSS $2,000,000.

Canadian Packing Plant Burned—Will Cause Large Meat Shortage.

Calgary, Alta., Jan. 14.—The packing plant of H. Burns & Co., has been destroyed by fire. The loss, including meat in cold storage, probably will be in excess of $2,000,000.

The loss is serious because the plant was the largest of its kind in this part of Canada, and from which all the western cities drew largely for their meat supply. The storage plant contained from 15,000 to 20,000 carcasses. The property was insured, including the stock in storage, for about 1,000,000.

Rockefeller Examined By Order.

Miami, Fla., Jan. 14.—William Rockefeller, whose testimony is wanted by the house committee investigating the so-called money trust, was examined here by Dr. Charles W. Richardson to determine whether or not the physical condition of the New York millionaire is such that he may safely testify. Dr. Richardson asserted that nothing would be given out regarding the examination until he had made his report to Representative Pujo, chairman of the committee.

Suffer From Plague of Rats.

A "pied piper of Hamelin" is needed at Santa Paula, Cal. Thousands of rats, and all big wood rats, have invaded the place, and the situation is such that women are afraid to go to church. The rats seem to have a preference for churches and on several occasions have forced the feminine attendance at services to take to the high benches. The city authorities are seeking means to abate the pest. The rats are believed to have been driven out of the wods by recent fires in the forests.

Public Would Gain.

"In looking over this paper I find that Mr. Prosckleyswicz Igualinczinski and Miss Malooloozek Winskadiakowski are engaged to be married."

"I am very glad to hear it."

"Why? What interest have you in it? Do you know them?"

"No, but I consider it a matter for public rejoicing that these two names are to be made one."—Stray Stories.

DREADED TO EAT.
A Quaker Couple's Experience.

How many persons dread to eat their meals, although actually hungry nearly all the time!

Nature never intended this should be so, for we are given a thing called appetite that should guide us as to what the system needs at any time and can digest.

But we get in a hurry, swallow our food very much as we shovel coal into the furnace, and our sense of appetite becomes unnatural and perverted. Then we eat the wrong kind of food or eat too much, and there you are—indigestion and its accompanying miseries.

A Phila. lady said:

"My husband and I have been sick and nervous for 15 or 20 years from drinking coffee—feverish, indigestion, totally unfit, a good part of the time, for work or pleasure. We actually dreaded to eat our meals. (Tea is just as injurious, because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"We tried doctors and patent medicines that counted up into hundreds of dollars, with little if any benefit.

"Accidentally, a small package of Postum came into my hands. I made some according to directions, with surprising results. We both liked it and have not used any coffee since.

"The dull feeling after meals has left us and we feel better every way. We are so well satisfied with Postum that we recommend it to our friends who have been made sick and nervous and miserable by coffee." Name given upon request. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum now comes in concentrated, powder form, called Instant Postum. It is prepared by stirring a level teaspoonful in a cup of hot water, adding sugar to taste, and enough cream to bring the color to golden brown.

Instant Postum is convenient; there's no waste; and the flavor is always uniform. Sold by grocers—50-cup tin 30 cts., 100-cup tin 50 cts.

A 5-cup trial tin mailed for grocer's name and 2-cent stamp for postage. Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich. Adv.

BACK TO COUNTRY FOR FIRE HORSE

FOREST SERVICE TELEPHONE LINE

THE city fire horse has heard the "Back to the Country" cry. The rolling eye, the distended nostril, the galloping hoofs of that wise old ally of the insurance companies are being replaced in the city's streets by a snorting, pounding, flame-belching gas engine that sends the big fire fighting machine screeching and scooting over the pavement at 90 miles an hour. But the fire horse doesn't care. His absence from the asphalt may be a blow to civic romance, but it's not an indication that he's rusticating in a paddock. As an institution he is going back to the land. He's proving his still vigorous usefulness by taking to the woods.

Nor is that a slur on his courage. He's being called into active service to help the government at Washington prevent its 159 national forests from going up in smoke. He hikes to a fire with a bifurcated bag containing nearly a barrel of water, or a chemical fire extinguisher slung across his backbone. He fords streams, travels precipitous trails and treads his way among the close set trees of the forest whose lives he is prepared to save. When the water bag he carries has been emptied, a forest ranger straddles his spine and hustles him back to the main supply. He can show his heels to an automobile fire engine any day, for no roads lead to the nooks in the woods where mysterious flames blaze up.

Ingenious Device.

Along with the use of the horse to carry up-to-date equipment for fire fighting in the timber lands, the foresters of the government service have hit upon many new and ingenious devices for aiding in the same work. It's a big job that confronts these experts in the care and protection of trees on a large scale. The national forest preserves are scattered from Maine to California and cover millions of acres. They must, of course, be cared for with the aim of making them produce the greatest number possible of healthy, well-formed trees. This involves protecting the growths against insect enemies, clearing out undesirable underbrush, disposing of surplus lumber where trees have been allowed to grow too close together, reforesting areas that have been cut off or burned over, etc.

But perhaps the most important function of all that the national foresters are called up to perform is the protection of these vast wooded areas from fire. While the seriousness of forest fires is generally known and conceded, it is not realized that losses, including those of forest products and young timber, are far in excess of the annual consumption of timber for commercial purposes. This loss becomes more apparent with the realization that the total fire damage includes not only the material that is consumed at the time of the conflagration, but that which may follow through years of deterioration and decay of timber which was not actually destroyed at the time the original injury was inflicted. This subsequent deterioration is practically true of hardwood species that are susceptible to fungous diseases and insect infestation.

The young seedling and coppice growth in a lumbered forest is markedly susceptible to fire injury, and if it is not killed outright the lumber subsequently manufactured from these trees is materially reduced in grade. Another loss, second only to the actual damage to the timber, and in some localities even greater than the timber loss, is the destruction of the forest floor of decaying vegetation, which would make humus to protect the surface and sustain tree growth. It has been found repeatedly by the government rangers that even in the best protected and most heavily wooded regions the loss from fires includes not only the burned timber and the surface layer of vegetable matter, but the rich topsoil that has resulted from the decay of litter previously accumulated. This is left exposed and is soon washed away.

The timber region covered by the Arkansas national forest in the state of Arkansas presents conditions almost identical with those of the southern Appalachians, and it is interesting to learn of the difficulties encountered in that preserve in caring for the timber, and in some of the new methods and contrivances that have already proved their worth in that section or have been recommended for early trial.

Let us then make our difficult way up the forest covered side of one of the highest peaks in the forest preserve in Arkansas. Perched on the topmost point of land is a big, square range-finder signal tower. It is built of rough boards, covered with sheet iron. The tower itself is about twelve feet square at the base, and a lean-to addition covers the same area. In the lean-to the wife of the range finder is busy mixing "cawn pone" and preparing a brace of rabbits for the family meal. Two young children playing about the steps of the tower are gazing with childish admiration at their father, who has just ascended the tower to examine more closely a distant column of smoke that has just attracted his attention.

Placing a Fire.

He stands on the top of the rude structure, which ends in a truncated pyramid surmounted by a platform about five feet square. He leans against the low railing to steady himself as he gazes at the distant signal of fire through a powerful field glass. The smoke is miles away, but whether seven miles or double that number it is impossible for him to tell, for as he glances up at the weather vane poised over his head he sees that the wind is blowing almost directly toward him and stretching out the smoke in a long trail over the tree tops.

He hurries down to the open deck that separates the top of the tower proper from the truncated pyramid above. Here he takes his place in a "sighting hood," something like a big box or a beach chair with one side open. It is mounted on a swivel, and as he sits down he can swing it to any point of the compass. Secured to the inside of the hood at his right are the maps of the forest, blocked off into squares, with the points of the compass plainly marked. Fastened to the other side is a telephone, which gives him almost immediate communication with the other signal towers in other parts of the forest, some of them 40 or 50 miles away.

As he sits in the hood he is surrounded by a series of 144 vertical wires, arranged in a complete circle, exactly two and one-half degrees apart. In the exact center of the sighting hood is a self-winding plumb bob. The ranger draws down this plumb bob, and, facing the distant smoke, lines it up, successively with the two wires between which the smoke appears. Each of the wires is numbered and by a quick reference to the map at his side the ranger can tell at once the limits of the smoke area to the right or left.

He climbs hastily back to the top of the tower and there signals to the nearest station, by means of a heliograph mounted on a small tripod, his observations regarding the location of the fire. The men in the other stations are already as busy as he has been, and soon he gets return information as to their observations. Their lines of vision, of course, when directed toward the smoke, cross his at wide angles, and by tabulating the results he quickly determines the exact limits of the area covered by the thickest of the smoke.

Hint to Uncle.

Miss Mary Garden, at a luncheon in Chicago, said, apropos of Christmas:

"To secure nice Christmas presents there's nothing like a delicate hint or two.

"I know a Philadelphia girl whose uncle, having grown rich from a western mine, proposed to visit her at Christmas for the first time in seventeen years, she wrote to the old gentleman:

"It will be glorious to see you again dear uncle. I will meet you at Broad street station on your arrival Christmas eve. But I might not recognize you after all those years, and so I think it would be best for you to hold, for purposes of identification, a long string of pearls in the left hand, and a bit of fur—such as an ermine-lined sable stole, for example—in the right."

PREPARING FOR THE WORK OF 1913

CITY BUILDING, RAILWAY BUILDING AND FARM OPERATIONS IN WESTERN CANADA, BIGGEST EVER.

The machinery, the money and the men for carrying on the big works in Western Canada in 1913 are already provided for. The splendid harvest which was successfully garnered, and by this time mostly marketed, responded to the big hopes that were had for it early in the season, and inspired capitalists and railroads to further investment and building. From lake ports to mountain base there will be carried on the biggest operations in city building and railway construction that has ever taken place in that country. The Canadian Pacific railway has everything in waiting to continue their great work of double tracking the system and by the time the Panama Canal is open to traffic there will be a double line of steel from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast. The cost will exceed thirty million dollars. The Grand Trunk Pacific plan of building a first-class trunk line and then feeders at various points will be carried forward with all the force that great company can put into the work. The Canadian Northern is prepared to put into motion all the energy that young giant of finance and railroad building can put into various enterprises of providing and creating transportation facilities.

Building operations in the several cities, that have already marked themselves a place in the list of successful and growing cities, will be carried on more largely than ever. Schools, public buildings, parliament buildings, colleges, business blocks, apartments, private residences, banks, street and other municipal improvements have their appropriation ready, and the record of 1913 will be something wonderful. Other places which are towns today will make the rapid strides that are expected and will become cities. There will be other Edmontons, Calgarys, Reginas and Saskatoons, other places that may in their activity help to convince the outer world of the solidity and permanency of the Canadian West. The country is large and wide and broad and the ends of its great width and length are but the limits of its agricultural area. Its people are progressive, they are strong, there is no enervation there. The country teems with this life, this ambition, this fondness to create and to use the forces that await the settler. If they come from the South, and hundreds of thousands of them have, they are now the dominant men of the North, and they have imbibed of the spirit of the North. Therefore it is fair to say that no portion of the continent will show such wonderful results as Western Canada, and the year 1913 will be but the beginning of a wonderful and great future. And in this future the 200,000 Americans who made it their home, and those who preceded them, will be a considerable portion of the machinery that will be used in bringing about the results predicted.

The development of 1913 will not be confined to the prairie provinces. Railway building and city building in British Columbia will be supplemented by the farm, the ranch and the orchard building of that province. Vancouver will make great strides in building, and Victoria, the staid old lady of so many years, has already shown signs of modern ways, and if the progress made in 1912 may be accepted as anything like what it will be in 1913, there will be wonderful developments there. During last year the permits went over the ten million dollar mark and much more is promised for the year now entered upon.—Advertisement.

Collecting Antiquities.

Slopay received a card on which was engraved: "Professor Brace, Antiquarian."

He knew no such person, so his curiosity led him to receive him.

"What is your business, professor?" he asked, politely.

"So I imagined. And how can I serve you?"

"By paying a deposit on this little bill you have owed for more than three years."

Personal Privilege.

"You sometimes contradict yourself in your speeches."

"I know it," replied the positive candidate. "And I want you to understand that I am the only man in our party who dares attempt such a thing."

OLD LANDMARK TO BE RAZED

Noted Toll-House in Boston to Be Torn Down—Will Be Replaced With a Theater.

Boston.—A structure of much historic interest, which will soon be torn down to make way for a theater, is the old toll-house at the northeast corner of Oxford street and Ridge avenue. The building, which is of frame and one and a half stories in height, was the first toll-house on the famous old Ridge Road which was the first improved road leading from this city to Norristown. It was built in 1811 by the Ridge Road Turnpike Company and is the last of the old toll-houses remaining within the city limits.

The building consists of two parts, the original structure and an addition built about 1860, which adjoins it on the corner. The old building was used as the toll-house for over 50 years until a change in the highways in the vicinity necessitated its abandonment, and the erection of a new house further up the road, at Issining avenue. The old house has been the property of one family ever since it was built. It was built by John S. Lawrence, the first toll-keeper, whose grandson, John H. Lawrence, recently sold it to the theatrical concern.

Famous Old Toll House Which Soon Will Be Razed.

Mr. Lawrence was born in the building and remembers his mother collecting tolls at the doorway. For many years Mr. Lawrence used it as an office for his coal yard. It was not far to the east of the old toll-gate that Porter, the highwayman, robbed the United States mail coach in the early part of the last century, for which he was hanged at Bush Hill, near Seventeenth street and Fairmount avenue. Another important building at the time which was closely associated with the toll-house was the Moss Cottage Hotel, which was built before the Revolution and stood a short distance west.

It was the custom in the days of the toll-house not to collect tolls from hearses and undertaker's wagons, nor funeral carriages on the way to a church yard. Funerals on the way to a cemetery, however, were compelled to pay. Carriages conveying persons to church services also were exempt from the toll. The rate was 1½ cents a mile for each horse and 1 cent for each head of cattle and swine.

JAIL TERM AS A "BRACER"

New York Court Is Lenient to Prisoner Who Stole When Starving.

New York.—Justice Steinert in special sessions sentenced Albert F. Morgan to thirty days in the Tombs to "brace him up." Morgan had pleaded guilty to the theft of a violin worth $15 from his landlady, Mrs. Marie Hardt, of 391 East 40th street.

"I had a position in Washington," he said, "until three months ago. Then I got in with a gay crowd and spent more money than I should and finally came to New York. For two days I had had nothing to eat, except some rolls I stole from a doorstep, and finally I stole the violin. I was desperate and down and out."

After a brief conference with Justices McInerney and Salmon, Justice Steinert announced the sentence. "You are on the verge of a breakdown," he said, "and it is for your own best interest that I send you to the city prison for thirty days."

FIGHTS CATAMOUNT AN HOUR

Beast Attacks a Pennsylvania Hunter, Killing Dog Before It Is Slain.

Pottsville, Pa.—Ellsworth Minning, returning to his home at Tremont about nightfall after a hunting trip, accompanied only by his dog, was attacked by one of the largest catamounts ever seen in this section. He felt the animal leap from the limb of a tree, as if by intuition, and stepped aside, just in the nick of time. The animal immediately engaged in a fight with the dog, which was killed. In the meantime Minning repeatedly emptied a shotgun into the catamount's body, and after an hour's struggle the animal was slain. It weighed exactly 26 pounds after it had been drawn.

HOW TO CURE RHEUMATISM
Prominent Doctor's Best Prescription Easily Mixed at Home.

This simple and harmless formula has worked wonders for all who have tried it quickly curing chronic and acute rheumatism and backache. "From your druggist get one ounce of Toris compound (in original sealed package) and one ounce of syrup of Sarsaparilla compound. Take these two ingredients home and put them in a half pint of good whiskey. Shake the bottle and take a tablespoonful before each meal and at bed-time." Good results come after the first few doses. If your druggist does not have Toris compound in stock he will get it for you in a few hours from his wholesale house. Don't be influenced to take a patent medicine instead of this. Insist on having the genuine Toris compound in the original, one-ounce, sealed, yellow package. This was published here last winter and hundreds of the worst cases were cured by it in a short time. A penny and a quarter, side by side in a pocket, fell into conversation.

"I'm worth 25 of you," said the quarter haughtily.

"That's true," replied the humble penny, "but in one respect, sir, I'm superior to yourself."

"Pshaw; how so?" said the quarter.

"I go to church, sir, far, far oftener than you," replied the penny.

Where Moses Read the Ten Commandments

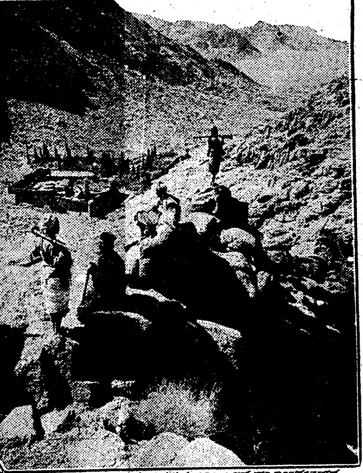
THE FORTIFIED BLACK CITADEL

SPOT ON WHICH MOSES READ TEN COMMANDMENTS

THOUSAND YEAR OLD CYPRESS TREES



PLAINS OF ASSEMBLAGE IN DISTANCE

MORE than 5,000 years ago there were gathered at the command of Moses, on the plains of Assemblage in the valley of Mount Sinai, all of the children of Israel to listen to the reading of the laws that were revealed to Moses during the "forty days and forty nights" he spent in the midst of a cloud communing with the God of the "chosen people."

Since that momentous and epoch-making event nations have risen to mighty power, only to go down to decay and oblivion. Unpeopled plains have been converted into hives of industry, and hives of industry have reverted back to unpeopled plains. New lands have been discovered and peopled and new seas have been navigated and charted. Everywhere progress has changed the physical condition of the people. Everywhere progress has changed the historical and geographical importance of nations and countries. Here, alone, in the Mount Sinai Valley, where the nation that gave us the Savior first sprang into prominence, progress has stood still. Surrounded by the peaks of the "Forty Martyrs," all is hushed and still on the plain where once the hum of thousands of voices was heard, and where the valley rang with the resounding march of the hosts of Israel.

On the peak of Ras-es-Safsafeh, the cross, the symbol of Christianity, has been planted on the very spot upon which Moses, the great law giver and leader of the Jews, stood and gave to his people the ten commandments, the basis of all religious beliefs and the foundation of all law, moral and civil. Now unpeopled and deserted, the very lonesomeness of the place is awe-inspiring, and the "silence of the tomb" is not more impressive than the "veil of silence" that envelops Ras-es-Safsafeh and its surroundings.

The mount on which God is said to have revealed himself to Moses is situated in the southern half of the so-called peninsula of Sinai, projecting into the northern extremity of the Red sea, between the Gulf of Suez on the west and the Gulf of Akabah on the east. This park of the peninsula consists of a mass of granite and porphyry mountains which may be divided into three groups, a northwestern, reaching in Jebel Serbal a height of 6,712 feet; a central, including Jebel Musa (Mount of Moses), 7,363 feet, and Jebel Katerin, 8,537 feet; and an eastern and southern, whose highest peak is Jebel Umm Shomer, 8,449 feet. Whether the Biblical Sinai was Jebel Umm Shomer of Jebel Musa was long disputed by leading authorities. The former was advocated by Eusebius, Jerome, Cosmas Indicopleustes, and in more modern times by Lepsius and Ebers. Jebel Musa, however, is preferred by most authorities, and is favored by tradition (which dates, however, only from Christian times), indicated by the name "Mountain of Moses," and the erection of a monastery upon it which goes back to the days of Justinian. The northern peak of Jebel Musa, known as Ras-es-Safsafeh (6,540 feet), meets the conditions required, since there is an open space at its base sufficient to accommodate a large encampment.

Standing on the lofty summit of Mount Sinai, what thoughts and visions are conjured up as one contemplates that there on the vast plain of Assemblage that stretches before the eye hundreds of feet below, fifty centuries ago, the commandments were deliverd to the assembled children of Israel.

Excepting for the Mount Sinai monastery, which from these heights looks like a little toy fort built of blocks, the region is still and hushed, and almost deserted. The massive walls of the monastery raised by the peace-loving and God-fearing monks under Justinian in 527 A. D. —as a protection against the marauding bands of Bedouins that infested that part of the country when the wealth of an empire was possessed by the builders and occupants of the monastery —are in the same condition as when built 1,500 years ago. Today, however, the Christian world keeps a watchful eye over this mountain monastery and its contents, and the Bedouins, knowing this to be the fact, keep on friendly as well as visiting terms with the monks.

In the monastery are stored the priceless books narrating the history of Christianity in the tongue of every Christian nation. Slowly the brotherhood of Mount Sinai monks are dying out, there being but twenty or twenty-five at the present time. The life and the pay—not enough to buy tobacco—are not sufficient inducement for young recruits to join the forces that year by year are growing smaller. In the course of a few years the treasures of the monastery will remain but a memory to remind one of the greatness of its founder, Justinian.

Looking northwest from Jebel Musa to Wadi el Loja the traveler who for days has been wearied by the sight of nothing else but the monotonous blue of the burning sky and the dreary desert all about him is exhilarated, pleased and rested by the sight of those beautiful cypress trees with their cool, dark foliage down in the wadi—the Arabic name for hollow or valley. One can scarcely imagine anything more dreary than the valley where these trees raise their heads above the rock-bound hollow in the desert. They stand in all their majesty in the gardens of the monastery of the Sinaitic monks on St. Catherine, one of the mountains of the range called the "Forty Martyrs," and great pride is taken by these men of God in these trees, which for a thousand years have broken the monotony of the desert waste and have cast their welcome shade wherein the weary traveler and the travel-stained caravan may rest and take shelter.

For more than a year the Israelites were encamped in the valley of Sinai when they again took up their wanderings in search of the promised land. Through Asia Minor they proceeded to the land of Canaan, their great leader, Moses, dying as they came in sight of the country which God had promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

One of the most important places in Asia Minor, on the road from Constantinople to Konia, is the ancient town of Afium Kara-Hissar, whose extraordinary citadel, rising 800 feet in its very center, was the Byzantine fortress of Aeroenus, where in 730 A. D. the Arabs, under the leadership of Sid el Battel el Ghazi, were defeated by the Turks in its very shadow. To get a view of this most picturesque town a climb up the stairway cut in the rock of the citadel brings one to the very summit where there still remain the mediaeval Turkish fortifications.

Like all other towns in Asia Minor, Afium Kara-Hissar is built of mud bricks. Its streets run in every direction of the compass. Although the language spoken there is Turkish, there is a large Armenian population. It is as dirty a place as one can imagine. Overrun with half-starved, howling dogs in the day, the night is made hideous by their mad attempts to clean up the refuse thrown in the streets. It is a good place to be avoided by the fastidious. The town boasts of a fine bazaar, churches for the Armenians and mosques for the Turks, as well as schools for both classes. The Armenians have made a commendable effort to make their part of the town inhabitable and sanitary.

The story of the birth and infancy of the founder and first legislator of the Israelite nation is one of the treasured gems of Hebrew literature. He was of the tribe of Levi, and his mother, Jochebed (his father's name was Amram), hid him three months in defiance of the edict of Pharaoh, who, to prevent the growth of his Hebrew slave population, had ordered all the male children to be put to death at birth. As the danger of discovery became great, the infant was placed in an ark on the Nile, was found and adopted by the daughter of Pharaoh, and was brought up as an Egyptian prince. But his heart was with his enslaved brethren, and his slaying of one of their oppressors necessitated his flight to Midian, where he received the divine call to be the deliverer of his people from Egypt. After considerable trouble he led them forth, crossed the Red sea, in which the pursuing Egyptians were drowned, and then, during a forty years' residence in the desert, organized the religious and social polity of the nation. Moses stands out as a sublime and unique figure, without whom neither Judaism, Mohammedanism, nor Christianity could have been what they are.

BEAR WAS HIS INDIAN WIFE.

Where the Hunter Shot Her Is Now Called Bear's House.

Along one of the branches of the Cheyenne river in South Dakota there stands a hill called Matoti, or Bear's House. Tradition tells this Indian legend about it:

Once upon a time an Indian hunter was out on the chase. He wandered for many a day through forest and plain, over hill and dale, till he finally came to a spot where Bear's House now is. Here he hunted for a while until one day he met a beautiful Indian woman.

As soon as he saw her he wanted to marry her. Long and hard was the wooing, for the Indian woman was unwilling to marry the stranger. At last she consented, but she made the stranger promise that he would never in the future hunt or kill the bear. This animal was her totem, sacred to her and an object of her worship. The hunter faithfuly promised to obey her wishes and to hunt all other animals and leave the bear unharmed. Then they were married and lived on in happiness and contentment for many a day.

Once it happened that the hunter started on the chase. Early he went and roamed all through the neighboring forest without killing a single thing. At last he became weary and tired from the chase and resolved to return to his wigwam. As he was approaching his home he saw in the dusky twilight the dark and shaggy form of a huge bear making straight for the wigwam.

"Now my wife will be lost," he thought, "for if the bear reaches there before me he will surely kill her."

Doubt at first stayed his hand, for he remembered his marriage vow. But fear and anxiety overcame his doubts. He raised his bow to his shoulder and aimed at the animal. One arrow sent straight to the heart laid the animal low. When the Indian came near he saw instead of the bear the lifeless form of his wife. The hill where they lived is still called the Bear's House, or Matoti Hill.

"Mebbe," replied Farmer Corntossel.

"Well, why don't you come out and express them?"

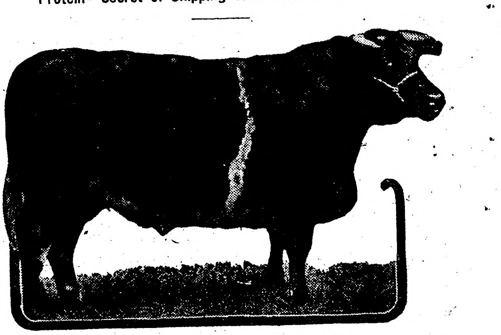
INEXPERIENCED CATTLE FEEDERS SUFFER HEAVY LOSS IN PREPARING FOR SHIPMENT

Larger Amount of Feed Is Consumed by the Beef Animals Than Any Other on the Farm—As a Rule Feeds Are Lacking in Protein—Secret of Shipping Is to Have Them Well Fed.



A Prize Winning English Shorthorn Steer.

Beef cattle should be found on every farm where cattle are not handled for the exclusive production of milk. Whether or not the farmer enters the dairy business or handles beef cattle, should depend upon the amount of labor available in proportion to the crops produced, the demand for milk and its products, and the equipment for the proper production of milk. Beef cattle will consume a larger amount of feed than any other class of farm animals in proportion to the labor necessary in handling them. They are especially adapted to the utilization of roughage, require a small outlay for buildings and equipment, and return to the soil a very large percentage of the plant food consumed, thus reducing expense of fertilizer.

It is not always the heaviest feeders who get the best results. Every animal requires certain nutrients that enable it to perform its best work. If these nutrients are not supplied in the proper proportions, it means that the animal must consume and adjust larger amounts of some of the elements that it can use, in order to get enough of the others. Economical feeding requires that nutrients be supplied to animals in the proportion needed. As a rule, farm feeds are lacking in protein. If one is feeding cornstalks or wild hay, the farm grains will supply enough protein to meet the animal's needs for best work. This is especially true of dairy cows and young stock. When this form of roughage must be fed, some such feed as bran, middlings or oil-meal must form a reasonable proportion of the grain ration, in order that the protein supply may be maintained.

Inexperienced cattle feeders frequently suffer quite a heavy loss on account of the shrinkage in weight between the time the cattle are taken from the pasture and the time they reach the market. The shrinkage is usually due to the careless feeding in transit, or lack of preparation of the cattle before they are put on the cars. Experienced shippers seem to be agreed on the point that cattle, which have been heavily fed for some weeks, should be prepared for shipment by withholding the usual grain feed for a day or two previous to shipping, and substituting for this grain feed roughage in the shape of good hay. Some very good advice along this line is given by John Clay in Henry's Feeds and Feeding, as follows:

A day or two previous to shipping, feed the cattle in a pen, and feed hay only. The secret of shipping all classes of cattle is to place them on the cars full of food, but with as little moisture as possible.

A steer full of water is apt to have loose bowels and show up badly in the yards; properly handled, cattle should arrive in the sale pens dry behind and ready for a good fill of water—not very thirsty, but in good condition to drink freely. Many shippers think that by salting their cattle or feeding them oats they can fool the buyers, but it always goes against them to use unnatural amounts.

As to feed on the road, nothing equals good sweet hay, which excels corn or other grains, because it is easily digested and does not fever the animal. Of water in midsummer, care must be taken to supply the animal wants, whereas in winter a steer can go for many hours without a drink. Cattle should arrive at the sale yards at from 5 to 8 a. m., appearing on the scene as near the latter hour as possible, since they always look better just after they have been fed and watered.

Funkhouser advises feeding all the hay the cattle will eat, and reducing the grain feed at least one-half two or three days before shipping. For steers in transit, allow 250 pounds of hay and one and one-half bushels of grain per car. Steers on pasture that have had corn should be taken off pasture twenty-four hours before shipping, and allowed half a feed of corn with plenty of hay.

KAFIR IS AS GOOD AS CORN FOR FEED

Silage Made From It Is Even Better Than Ordinary Kind for Live Stock.

Kafir is as good a feed as corn. Because farmers are learning this, kafir has become one of the most important crops grown in Kansas today. The grain is valued highly as a feed for all classes of live stock. In feeding, five bushels of kafir seed are considered as being equivalent to four bushels of shelled corn. It should be ground for all classes of live stock, excepting poultry, as it is so hard that they do not masticate it thoroughly if it is fed whole. It should never be fed wet.

Silage made from kafir excels corn silage as a feed, as the percentage of grain and leaf to stalk is much higher in the kafir. The same thing is true in regard to kafir fodder and corn stover.

Some of the farmers over the state cut their kafir with a corn binder. They then cut the heads off with a knife, similar to a tobacco cutter, only much larger, which is attached to the side of a wagon box. The heads are allowed to fall into the wagon box and are then threshed. The fodder which is left is excellent feed. Some persons have advocated the feeding of this fodder to horses suffering from the heaves, but Dr. C. W. McCampbell, assistant professor of animal husbandry at the Kansas Agricultural college, says that it has no more value for this purpose than any other similar feed.

Keeping Sheep in Condition.

Doctoring sheep is expensive and often unsatisfactory, unless the symptoms of the disease are clearly understood. If sheep are not exposed to bad weather in the late fall, and are given proper care and feed, there is not much show for disease, unless brought in from other flocks. With sheep an ounce of prevention is worth considerably more than a pound of cure.

PREVENTING GRUB IN HEAD OF SHEEP

Noses of Animals Should Be Tarred Often During Fly Time to Repel Pests.

The condition known as grub in the head is caused by the presence in the cavities of the head between the eyes of the larva (worm stage) of the sheep bot fly. The trouble is confined to sheep and occasionally goats. The eggs are laid in the nostrils of the sheep during the summer by a yellowish-gray fly somewhat larger than the house fly. The eggs hatch and work their way up into the cavities of the head between the eyes, according to the Southern Agriculturist, but not in the brain. They attach themselves there and remain about ten months, when they loosen their holds and are sneezed out and burrow into the ground. There they pass through another stage, emerging in a month or six weeks an adult fly, and the life cycle is begun over again.

A few grubs may not cause enough trouble to be noticed. However, if there are many a thick, dirty, white or yellowish discharge is caused; coughing and sneezing, tossing of the head and weakenled gait. Sometimes death results.

A veterinarian can relieve the sheep by trephining, but prevention of infection is a better practice. In fly time the noses of the sheep should be tarred often. Some force their sheep to take their salt through an auger hole and keep it smeared with tar during fly time. A dark shed where the sheep may escape from the flies is a great help.

Small Farms.

A farmer near Philadelphia took a little farm of 15 acres. Upon that farm he was enabled to grow the first year enough to winter two head of cattle and a horse, and in a number of years [illegible] He employed a man and a boy. If you figure that up it comes to about 20 men on 100 acres of land.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

A DRAMATIC HOLIDAY

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

WHILE I was chief of the detective police I remember to have taken but few holidays. Many a time had I packed my trunk, in the hope of spending a week or a fortnight in a secluded spot among peaceable citizens, but somehow or other fate ordained that the train that was to carry me away should start, leaving me and my luggage behind.

"One of these days you will collapse," my friends used to say, and, like all evil predictions, theirs came true. I had been fearfully busy. There had been an avalanche of crimes, and the strain had begun to tell on me, to an obligato accompaniment of headache, sleeplessness, and other unpleasant symptoms. With a mistaken sense of duty I tried to cling to my post, but when I saw I had the medical faculty against me, I gave up the battle and promised to take a rest.

The following day, as I was walking down the Rue de la Paix a voice like thunder called out my name. I did not see the man, but I knew that in the whole of France only one person possessed such an organ—my old friend Stanislas Tilon, a captain in the merchant navy.

Good old Stanislas, who stood six feet three, had not only a tremendous voice—everything with him was big. He seized both my hands in his lion grip, and, having knocked my stick out of my hand, and my hat off my head, he conducted, or rather dragged, me to the Cafe de la Paix.

"Fancy meeting you!" he roared. "I came back on Tuesday last, and am off again the day after tomorrow. But what's the matter with you? You look out of sorts."

"The fact is," I said, "I am not very well. The doctors say I must take a holiday."

Down came Stanislas' fist, upsetting all the dominoes on the table next to ours.

"You want a thorough holiday? I'll give you one. You may bless your stars you met me. We are running a regular line of steamers from Bordeaux to St. Louis, on the African coast, stopping at Madeira and Teneriffe. They are capital boats, carrying only a small number of passengers. I am in command of the Gambia, the most comfortable of the lot. You'll be my guest, and the sea will put you right in no time. We are going only as far as Teneriffe, so that you will be back in three weeks. I'll give you one of the two deck cabins, and you'll be as happy there as a king. We have a splendid cook, and as nice a lot of passengers as you'd wish to meet."

Stanislas' proposition tempted me. My shaken nerves clamored for a rest such as I knew I should find on the high seas! and, after a few objections, immediately overruled by my friend, I accepted his invitation.

The following day at two in the afternoon I arrived at Bordeaux, and went straight on board. Stanislas welcomed me with unaffected joy, and after an excited and whispered discussion between him and the steward, the latter took my valise to the deck cabin on the starboard side.

The rain was coming down in torrents as I descended to the saloon to join my shipmates. Several persons were sitting at the long tables, some writing, others reading, and I noticed one, a pronounced German type—his name was Von Winter — drinking champagne and playing solitaire.

Before the dinner hour had struck Stanislas had introduced me to everybody. Besides Von Winter there were M. Van Vloot, a rich wine importer, with an aquiline nose, and the shortest legs I have ever seen belonging to a man of his size, and his wife, a stout lady, afflicted with toothache; Mr. Aylmer Knowles, a Scotchman with an expressionless face, accompanied his wife and daughter, the latter an unusually pretty girl; Father Glass, a priest; Monsieur Waskywicz, of no nationality, with comic eyes, fat cheeks, blue with the razor, who turned out to be a comedian; Dr. Lopez, an oculist; and Senor Gonzales, a South American Spaniard, a handsome, aristocratic looking man, whose temper seemed to be considerably ruffled.

I guessed that our loquacious captain had been talking about me, for not only the passengers watched me with curiosity, but the crew stared at me open-mouthed. As there was a piano in the saloon, and none in the smoking room, I decided to make the latter my headquarters.

"Hallo, old chap," roared Stanislas. "How do you like your hotel? Where do you want to sit at table? Near that pretty Scotch girl, I suppose."

"Since you ask me," I replied, "you can place me between the German and the lady with the toothache. Neither of them looks talkative, and that just suits me."

"Poor Goron," said my friend, giving me a slap on the shoulder that sent my cap overboard. "Wait a couple of days, and you'll see the good the breeze will do you."

"It looks like clearing up," I remarked, for the rain had stopped.

"Don't build on that, sonny. The glass has tumbled, and I expect after midnight we'll have a fine dance. They'll all be in bed by that time, I hope."

Stanislas had given me the seat of honor at the table, on his right, but he was too busy to put in an appearance. On my other side was Senor Gonzales, still very upset, and growling to the steward something I could not hear about his cabin.

The German, who kept on drinking champagne, was the first to address me, with the question:

"Do you play poker?"

"I never gamble. Why do you ask?"

"Because we might have a game in the smoking room tonight. I thought perhaps you'd like to join."

"I will join you in a smoke," I said, "but not in the game. I never play."

"I'm awfully fond of a spin at poker," put in M. Van Vloot, "and so is Becky, if her tooth does not worry her. How is your tooth, Becky?"

"Thank you, Sol, I feel much better. I dare say a little game would just put me right. And I don't mind the smoke."

Mr. Knowles, who had not opened his lips at dinner, remarked in a rasping voice:

"A sea trip without poker is like a dog without a tail. I'll play, too."

"I'll also take a hand," said Mr. Lopez.

"I gamble on principle," grunted the comedian; "it's the only principle I have," a joke which sent Mme. Van Vloot into a fit of imbecile laughter.

As soon as dinner was over there was a general rush for the smoking room, and in the saloon remained only the priest and Mrs. Knowles, dozing in their chairs; and Miss Knowles, a book on her lap, deep in thought, with a smile on her pretty face.

For a long time I paced the deck enjoying the fresh air and the stillness around me, and having wished Stanislas good night, I decided to turn in, when curiosity prompted me to see how the gamblers were getting on. Mme. Van Vloot was standing in the door of the smoking room, very much out of temper.

"Don't you play?" I asked.

"I have played," she replied in a solemn tone, "and I have lost my money. And so has Sol, and so has that German gentleman, and so has Mr. Knowles, and so has the actor with the funny name. We have all lost our money. Senor Gonzales has raked it all in. What luck that man has! I never saw anything like it."

As I entered the room Gonzales passed me. He was tired, he said, and wanted to go to rest. I saw the other players looking at one another, and the atmosphere seemed charged with voiceless currents of thought.

"He cleared us out very nicely," at last remarked Mr. Knowles.

"He did," repeated the others in chorus.

"I'll tell you what I think—" began Van Vloot in an excited tone.

"You needn't express your thoughts," cut in Mr. Knowles, "for we all think the same thing. As for me, I don't intend to play again with that gentleman; and I wish you all pleasant dreams."

I was beginning to feel more contented. Our old steamer was not so black as she was painted, and beneath her somewhat fresh exterior she hid a few sterling qualities in the way of comfort. I lit another cigarette and resumed my walk. But a change had come over the weather. It was blowing very hard, and the waves rolled in mountains under a sky of lead. In less than a quarter of an hour a gale broke, and heavy seas swamped the deck.

"You'd better turn in," said the first officer, "it will get worse during the night."

I followed his advice, although sleep was out of the question.

The wind howled and the water crashed against the side of the steamer with a deafening noise. It was anything but soothing to the nerves. Toward five in the morning I dozed off, and may have slept for half an hour, when I was roughly shaken and some one called out my name. I felt the wind blow on me through the open door, and there stood Stanislas with the first officer behind him.

"Come at once," shouted the captain, "we want you!"

Having forced me into my trousers and coat, he took me to the cabin on the port side, facing mine. The storm had abated, but there was still a heavy sea, and Stanislas gripped my arm to steady me. The steward stood outside as if on guard. Stanislas pushed him aside, opened the door, and said:

"Look at that!"

I recoiled with horror. The cabin was bespattered with blood.

"Great heavens! Whose berth is this?" I asked.

"Gonzales'," replied Stanislas.

"But where is he?"

"We can't find a trace of him. An hour ago the steward, fancying he heard him call, opened the door and nearly dropped with fright. He at once came to me, and, while I sent him to every cabin to account for the passengers, I mustered the crew. Only poor Gonzales is missing. Do you mind helping me in this business, Goron? I am so distressed I do not know what course to take?"

"All right, old chap," I said; "I did not come here to hunt criminals, but I will do what I can."

I made a careful examination of everything in the cabin. Gonzales' watch was on a small shelf near the bed, on the top of some bank notes and gold—probably his winnings of the night before. A pocket book stuffed with notes was lying next to it, also his scarf, in which a valuable diamond pin was stuck.

"Did Gonzales not have a big gray ulster?" I asked.

"Yes, he had," replied my friend, "and I do not see it here. "I'll have a search made for it; and if it is gone, it will be rather strange."

"No, not so strange as you think," I said. "I fancy I can account for its absence."

"What is it?" cried Stanislas excitedly. "What do you make of it?"

"You will know that in a moment. You must now take all the valuables and seal them up. In the meanwhile I will stay here and make a closer inspection."

When everything had been removed from the cabin and the door locked, I said:

"And now I want to look at the crew."

At my request every man stripped to the waist, but although I carefully examined their arms and necks, I could not detect the slightest scratch or bruise of recent date. Nor, when I overhauled every article of clothing and linen they possessed, did I find any blood stains. At their own request I subjected the officers to the same treatment. I next questioned the officers and men who had been on duty between eleven o'clock the night before and four in the morning. Nobody had seen or heard anything suspicious.

"What do you make of it?" I asked Stanislas.

"Some of the facts are plain enough. Gonzales' throat was cut with a sharp instrument—probably a razor. He was lying on his right side, with his face to the wall. There was no struggle. Had there been any in that narrow space, the objects lying about would have been disturbed."

At that moment the steward came to tell us that the ulster had not been found."

"I expected this," I said. "The murderer, to prevent himself being blood-stained, took the precaution of wrapping the body in the ulster before pitching it overboard. The dark night, and the sea washing the deck during the gale helped him in his work."

"Have you heard of the scene at poker last night?" my friend suddenly asked.

"I have. Did they play high?"

"Yes. From what I gathered, Von Winter and Lopez lost a big amount, and Waskywicz, the actor, also came off badly."

"Do you suspect Gonzales of not having played a fair game? They threw out some unpleasant hints."

"I have known Gonzales for two years. Once before I had him as a passenger, and this is the first time I heard of such a thing."

"I will finish dressing," I said; "and in the meantime you can have a talk with the passengers. I dare say they have heard by now what has happened. I will join you in the saloon."

When I came in I beheld a curious spectacle. Mme. Van Vloot lay in a swoon on the sofa, and her husband was holding a smelling-bottle to her nose. All looked terror-stricken, and they all sat apart eyeing one another with suspicion. Stanislas stood erect at the head of the table, and had just left off speaking. A silence fell upon the assembly when they saw me, and Mr. Knowles said:

"M. Goron, the captain has told us of the awful catastrophe that happened in the night, and he has informed us you have kindly consented to give him the benefit of your experience to inquire into the matter before we reach Madeira. We are anxious to give you all the assistance we can."

I then questioned them all in turn; but they knew nothing. With the exception of Von Winter none of the passengers had left their cabins during the night. As to the latter, he stated that at two in the morning, feeling very hot, he had stood for a while on the stairs leading to the saloon, without having seen or heard anything suspicious.

Half an hour later, as I went toward the smoking room, one of the sailors asked me to come to the captain's cabin. I found Lopez there.

"M. Lopez," said Stanislas, "wishes to ask you something."

"M. Goron," began Lopez, "did Von Winter mention to you a violent discussion he had with M. Gonzales after the game?"

"No, he did not."

"When I went to bed Von Winter was alone in the saloon reading. I was just beginning to undress when I heard a noise of people quarreling. I opened my door, walked toward the saloon, and saw Von Winter gesticulating, apparently in a great rage. I listened, but could not catch a word they said. It lasted only a minute or so, and I saw Gonzales walk away shrugging his shoulders."

"Did you, or any one else, refer to this to Von Winter?"

"No. He is very reserved, in fact rather unsociable; and since he came on board he has hardly conversed with any one."

I went in search of the German, and found him smoking his pipe right aft.

"You had," I said, "a dispute with Gonzales last night. How is it you never mentioned this to me?"

He turned red, bit his lip, and then said:

"I ought to have told you, but I was ashamed to do so. I played like a fool, and lost a lot of money—more than I can afford. I then had an idea —and the others had it, too—that M. Gonzales had—well, not played a fair game. I was too annoyed to go to bed, and sat alone in the saloon reading, when he walked in. I am sorry to say my temper got the better of me, and I accused him of having cheated, whereupon he flew into a fearful rage, called me a scoundrel, and said he would have the matter out with me this morning. You can imagine how I was shocked when I heard what had occurred. I suppose this story has by now gone the round of the steamer, and to judge from the way my fellow passengers look at me, they have settled among themselves that it is I who murdered M. Gonzales. I shall remember this trip!"

And, without waiting for what I might have to say, he replaced his pipe between his lips and resumed his walk.

Von Winter's last statement proved correct. He was boycotted, and when after dinner I went to the captain's cabin, Stanislas expressed his opinion that the case against the German looked suspicious.

"Do you mean to tell me seriously," I asked, "that you suspect Von Winter?"

"I say he was the first person I thought of in connection with the crime; and by following that track we might get the truth. Why do you look so surprised?"

"Because you make light of the most important feature of this case. You may knock out of your head the idea that Von Winter played a part in that awful drama. I cannot prevent our passengers from finding him guilty, but, fortunately for him, they cannot hang him. I have done some reconnoitering, and have come to a strange, yet conceivable conclusion. I think I have found my way to the mystery, but the key is missing."

The steward, happening to come in, told us for the fifth time how, when at four that morning he brought the captain his coffee, he fancied he heard some one call out, which caused him to look into Gonzales' cabin. A thought suddenly struck me.

"Steward," said I, "I heard M. Gonzales whisper something to you about his cabin, and he seemed upset. What did he want of you?"

The steward silently glanced at the captain.

"It is all right," said the latter to him; "you can go on. I will explain the case to M. Goron."

"Goron," he stammered, "I am sorry you found that out. The truth is I had a little trouble with Gonzales, and you were the innocent cause of it. A few months ago when Gonzales traveled with me on this steamer he had the starboard cabin, and he booked it again this time. Yesterday afternoon I saw the glass fall rapidly, and not knowing how long the bad weather might last, I ordered the steward, as you were my guest, to give you that cabin, where you would be more comfortable. I forbade him to mention this to you, and made him explain to Gonzales that a mistake had been made, and that this cabin had been retained by you long in advance. Gonzales was very much annoyed."

"You double-barreled idiot!" I shouted. "Why did you conceal this from me?"

"Goron—I say—" gasped Stanislas.

"Great heavens! To think that of all people, you, Stanislas, should have been walking about with the key of the mystery in your pocket. It seems fantastic!"

"I—had—the—"

"Yes, you have been playing the fool's part in this affair. How long before I came on board did you do that shuffling of cabins?"

"About an hour, I should say, and—"

"And everybody on board knew the day before that your friend Goron had the cabin on the port side?"

"Most likely, but—"

He stopped, stared at me wildly for a few seconds, and caught both my hands.

"Goron, my dear old friend," he cried, with a sob in his voice, "I see what you are hinting at. It is too horrible to be true."

"I see you have grasped my theory," I said. "Yes, Stanislas, it was I whom the murderer had marked out, and your changing those cabins probably saved my life. But at what a price!"

For a while we sat in silence.

"I suppose you have by this time spotted the murderer?" asked my friend.

"Yes, I suspected a certain person from the very start. But it is getting late, and, for many reasons, it would be unwise for me to act tonight. Tomorrow morning I will bring the culprit before you."

"You don't think I'll let you sleep in your cabin tonight!" exclaimed Stanislas. "You'll share mine."

Knowing it would be useless to argue with him, I gave in. Before retiring to rest I went to the saloon to see how the passengers were getting on, and could hardly repress a smile. They had organized a kind of vigilance committee, and two of them watched in turns, with special injunctions to keep an eye on Von Winter.

"And now," I said to my friend the next morning, "we will reconstruct the drama and take action. I warn you, however, that we have to be circumspect, for we have to deal with a crafty man, crafty because he is insane. He is one of your crew."

"Do you mean to say I have a lunatic among my ship's company, and never knew it?"

"How do you know he is not mad? If all the lunatics were locked up, the Paris streets would be empty. Now please follow my reasoning. When I arrived on board I strolled about, amused myself taking stock, not only of the passengers, but of the sailors, when I came across a man with a very dirty face—one of your stokers —who had a curious way of narrowing his eyes to a slit when he spoke. I also noticed he had a slight limp."

"That's Comtat," said Stanislas.

"Had I been in harness this peculiarity might have presented itself to me in a way of a problem; but here, resting from my labors, I confess I did not even give it a thought. Yesterday morning, however, after we made that awful discovery, and you and I went down to the engine room, this man Comtat was leaning, half dozing, against the wall, and, seeing me, he started. It was not the normal start of a person suddenly awakened from a slumber; it was just a trifle more; enough to rouse my suspicion. The problem being now thrust upon me, I had to solve it; and, having made certain that I had arrested this man some years ago for attempting to murder one of his fellow workmen, I felt convinced it was he who killed the unfortunate Gonzales in the belief he was dispatching me. No landsman could have performed the deed in such a businesslike manner during that gale. It could only have been a sailor—and your Comtat is the man."

"He was wreaking vengeance on you?"

"Vengeance? No, my friend. A discharged convict will turn on one of his former pals who betrayed him. But have you ever heard of a criminal wreaking vengeance, as you call it, on the judge who sentenced him, or on the governor of the prison who kept him under lock and key? I know of only two such cases, and both times it was proved the assailant was mad. And now, please, send for the chief engineer."

"M. Seguier," I said to that gentleman, "I want to talk with you about Comtat. How long has he been with you?"

"About eight months. He came to me from a Dutch steamer, and brought an excellent certificate."

"But he drinks, I suppose?"

"Ah, there's the trouble. I heard from the other stokers that Comtat had smuggled several bottles of absinthe on board, and, although I searched everywhere, I cannot detect the place where he secreted them. When he is on duty he is sober; but after he retires to his bunk he absorbs, I am afraid, a quantity of liquor."

"I quite agree with you, M. Seguier," I replied. "In the meantime I beg of you to keep a careful watch on him."

"I understand, M. Goron. Do you want to see the man now?"

"No. Send him to me at midday."

An hour later I was sitting in the smoking room thinking of my coming interview with Comtat, when some one shouted my name:

"You are wanted at once in the engine room, sir."

As I climbed down the iron ladder, sinister shrieks came from below. The captain and our young doctor were bending over the prostrate engineer, bleeding from an ugly gash in the forehead, while half a dozen men were holding Comtat, who was foaming at the mouth and uttering unearthly yells.

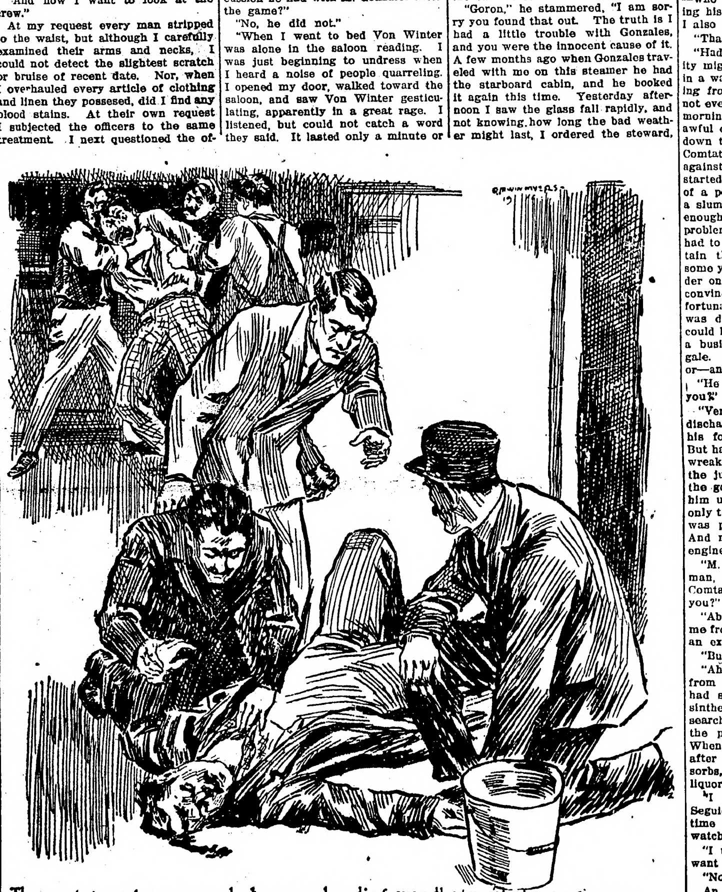
M. Seguier, it appears, had discovered where Comtat hid his absinthe and had taken possession of the stock, whereupon Comtat, in a violent passion, had hurled an empty bottle at the engineer's head and had tried to grab his throat.

M. Seguier's wound fortunately was not dangerous, and the doctor took his arm to conduct him upstairs. The moment Comtat caught sight again of the engineer his frenzy returned.

"You hound!" he howled. "You thief!—I'll be quits with you. I'll cut your throat and pitch your body overboard like I did to the other man! Yes, over you'll go, you thief!"

"It's a bad case of delirium tremens," remarked our doctor to me, "and, as it not unfrequently happens, the tremor is hardly perceptible. Absinthe, more than any other spirit, will produce these results."

Toward evening Comtat was seized with a worse fit, when he described the murder scene in all its ghastly details. At the same time he told how he had watched me come on board, and there and then made the determination to take my life, and until he saw me the morning after the murder was convinced that the man he had killed was myself.



The captain and our young doctor were bending over the prostrate engineer

A HIDDEN DANGER

"Every Picture Tells a Story"

It is a duty of the kidneys to rid the blood of uric acid, an irritating poison that is constantly forming inside.

When the kidneys fail, uric acid causes rheumatic attacks, headaches, dizziness, gravel, urinary troubles, weak eyes, dropsy or heart disease.

Doan's Kidney Pills help the kidneys fight off uric acid—bringing new strength to weak kidneys and relief from backache and urinary ills.

Minnesota Legislature

Proceedings at the Minnesota State Capitol for the Past Week.

St. Paul, Jan. 13.—Lieutenant Governor Burnquist worked Saturday in preparing his committees. He said that they will be announced next Tuesday morning. It is expected that Mr. Burnquist will give the Progressive Democrats good representation, so that there will be harmony and a good working organization in the senate.

At the same time he is not expected to penalize the men who voted against him. They will be treated fairly, but will not be placed in positions where they can block progressive legislation.

Rines Is Also Busy.

Speaker Rines of the House of Representatives is also framing his committees. He is expected to announce them Monday evening when the House convenes. It is expected that progressives will be on guard in all of the important committees, so that issues involving important legislation will be put squarely up to the House for adoption or rejection. Legislators generally have gone to their homes over Sunday.

Brewery Control of Saloons.

Legislation which if enacted will do away with the brewery ownership and control of saloons in Minneapolis will be introduced in the senate at an early date. The senate committee appointed at the special session to investigate this problem in formulating its report. This committee is composed of Senators Saugstad, Rustad and Boyle.

The committee held sessions in Minneapolis until the courts decided that it could not compel witnesses to appear before it, since it was not a joint committee of the house and senate and was not sitting during the session. When the committee held sessions in St. Paul only one or two witnesses appeared. It was largely a game of waiting on the part of the senators. The senators declare, however, that the treatment accorded them by city officials and brewery men who were summoned has simply aroused the people of the state.

According to Senator Saugstad there has been much information sent to the committee by private individuals.

N. J. Holmberg of the House is at work on a civil service bill. It will be an adaptation to Minnesota conditions of the Wisconsin civil service law. This law places the work in the hands of a commission of three members.

Representative Kneeland of Minneapolis had a similar bill in the House at the last session, but it was taken up late and did not get through.

One of the objections to the commission of three idea is that it is an expensive organization. Wisconsin students of the bill favor a single commissioner. That was the idea of Mr. Kneeland two years ago.

Third party Progressives are working on a similar bill, and they may make one of the state officers an ex-officio commissioner. If the state auditor was relieved of his work caring for state lands he would be the officer chosen.

600 Applicants.

The speaker of the lower house of the legislature is having his troubles, trying to apportion 55 jobs at his command among 600 applicants.

Anyone who believes that the principal job of the presiding officer is to gain enough votes to insure his election and then perfect an organization would think otherwise if he spent a few hours with him at him rooms at the Merchants hotel, St. Paul.

St. Paul, Jan. 11.—In the beautifully decorated rotunda of the state capitol, surrounded by the members of his military staff in their gold-braided uniforms, Governor Eberhart received more than 5,000 persons last night.

It was the first inaugural reception held in St. Paul for 15 years, the first of its kind in the present capitol. The last previous reception was given by Governor Merriam in 1898. Mrs. Eberhart stood with the governor.

The capitol Insurgent house members began their attack on the Rines organization by repeated attempts to amend the report of the committee on rules, in an endeavor to lessen the control of the Rines forces. They were defeated at every turn by overwhelming votes. The strength of the Rines forces reached as high as 100 members.

St. Paul, Jan. 10.—The session of the house Thursday was not only a lively and interesting one, but had special importance because of a division which is regarded as indicating the alignment of the opposing forces. The vote taken was on Representative Pfaender's motion to give the minority representation on the rules committee. This committee is in effect the speaker's cabinet and its duty, while not defined anywhere with special clearness, is to direct the cause of legislation. Mr. Pfaender's motion was defeated by a vote of 48 to 69, which indicates that while the organization is safely in control it has but small margin to spare.

Motion Made During Debate.

The motion was made in the debate on the motion to adopt the report of the committee on rules. This report introduces a number of changes in procedure, among others the vesting in the rules committee authority to arrange for the meetings of legislative committees. The two Dunns, R. C. and H. H., attacked this proposition tooth and nail. "It puts the house in legislative hobble skirts," shouted Harry. "It is an infamous rule," solemnly declared Bob. Tom Kneeland and John Lennon, in no wise averse to taking a fall out of their fellow citizen of Minneapolis, W. I. Nolan, joined in the chorus. "It is the suggestion of a despot," affirmed Mr. Kneeland, and Mr. Lennon gave it as his firm conviction that when it comes to dictation the rules committee could give pointers to the czar of all the Russias. The rule was somewhat modified. Notwithstanding the display of fireworks neither the rule itself as originally proposed nor the tempered one passed is calculated to make any difference in legislative procedure that an outsider would notice.

Occupies Day's Session.

The debate occupied the greater part of the day's session. At its conclusion a number of bills were introduced.

The short hour the senate was in session was enlivened by a personal explanation by Senator Duxbury who took exception to Sam Gordon's criticism in last week's paper, to the effect that, while the senator from the first district was much given to talking one way and voting another, with all his faults he wasn't at all a bad sort of fellow. "A person with a single-barreled muzzle-loading style of mind like the late lamented 'King for a Day,' said Mr. Duxbury, "cannot be expected to realize" so and so and so and so. After this outburst the senate settled down to listen to the clerk drawing off the titles of new bills introduced and, when tired of the exercise, took an adjournment from its exhaustive labors until Monday.

St. Paul, Jan. 9—Specific legislation recommended by the governor in his annual message which was read yesterday before a joint convention of the senate and house, includes the creation of a department of public domain and a department of agriculture as the first steps in the complete reorganization of the state executive departments. The governor also recommends putting every office in the state on a salary basis and the abolition of the fee systems. "If," he said, "the fee inspection service of this state were abolished and placed under departments where it rightly belongs, the state could save enough money to pay for the entire reorganization of the state departments and yet have a considerable balance to turn over into the treasury." Other measures recommended are:

Legislative and congressional reapportionment.

Presidential preference primaries.

State control of securities.

Workmen's compensation law.

Laws for the better regulation of women and child labor.

Extension of the consolidated rural school system.

Good roads legislation.

Larger appropriations for state publicity and development purposes.

Abolishment of appeals in civil and criminal cases except on final judgment.

Establishment of a legislative reference bureau connected with the state university.

Initiative and referendum.

Measures for the care of wives and children of men convicted of crime.

The establishment of a system of state aided county tuberculosis hospitals.

Prior to the meeting of the joint convention the committee on rules, which consists of Messrs. Nolan, Johnson, J. T. Conley, Knapp, Davis, Peterson, A. J., and Orr, made its report. The changes, while considered important, refer to modes of procedure and are too technical to be of general interest.

Insurgency later appeared in a resolution submitted by Representative Lydiard of Minneapolis, the effect of which, if adopted, would be to have a committee of the house and not the speaker, decide what house officials are necessary. The resolution will be considered later.

The senate met for the transaction of business after the adjournment of the joint convention. Bills were introduced at this session. Senate File No. 1, of which Senator Sageng is the author, is for a constitutional amendment to give women the right to vote.

MR. GOSLINGTON GOT EVEN

Collision of Ill-Mannered Man and Fire Hydrant Afforded Him Much Satisfaction.

"You know the crowding, pushing, ill-mannered chaps," said Mr. Goslington, "that elbow their way through and crowd you off into the gutter, like as not, and pass right on with never a thought? I encountered one of them this morning in Sixth avenue.

"He overtook me, coming up from the rear, walking faster than I, and when he had come to me he didn't sheer out, but kept right along, shouldering me so that I almost fell into the street. But in one brief moment I was more than fully avenged.

"Just as this ill-mannered chap shouldered me I had arrived at a fire hydrant, for which I was about to sheer out. You know the fire hydrant? Built of cast iron, very hard, and standing up rigidly, very rigidly. You can't just shoulder a fire hydrant out of the way, and just as this man shouldered me out of his course he came upon the fire hydrant, which with me covering it from view he had not seen. His next rude, reckless step forward carrying him up against this fire hydrant fair and squarely perbunk!

"And it didn't break his leg, but it did make him limp; he limped quite perceptibly. I was pleased to see, as he walked away."

FINGERS SO PAINFUL COULD NOT SLEEP

R. F. D. No. 2, Box 252, Seattle, Wash.—"The three middle fingers right at the end of my nails troubled me for three years. They would get so inflamed, burn and be so painful I could not sleep. It seemed every time I had my hands in soapy water they would get worse. They would be so very sore, then the nails would come off, and no more would a new one grow on when they would begin to get sore again. The nail came off my third finger four times. I tried everything with no results until one day I read of a lady who seemed to have had a similar trouble cured by Cuticura Soap and Ointment. I decided to try them and sent for a sample. I bought a 50c. box of Cuticura Ointment and some Cuticura Soap and now I am thankful my fingers are perfectly cured and my nails perfectly smooth. Cuticura Soap and Ointment cured me." Women Avoid Operations

When a woman suffering from some form of feminine disorder is told that an operation is necessary, it of course frightens her.

The very thought of the hospital operating table and the surgeon's knife strikes terror to her heart, and no wonder. It is quite true that some of these troubles may reach a stage where an operation is the only resource, but thousands of women have avoided the necessity of an operation by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. This fact is attested by the grateful letters they write to us after their health has been restored.

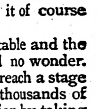
These Two Women Prove Our Claim.

Cary, Maine.—"I feel it a duty I owe to all suffering women to tell what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did for me. One year ago I found myself a terrible sufferer. I had pains in both sides and such a soreness I could scarcely staighten up at times. My back ached, I had no appetite and was so nervous I could not sleep, then I would be so tired mornings that I could scarcely get around. It seemed almost impossible to move or do a bit of work and I thought I never would be any better until I submitted to an operation. I commenced taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and soon felt like a new woman. I had no pains, slept well, had good appetite and was fat and could do almost all my own work for a family of four. I shall always feel that I owe my good health to your medicine."—Mrs. Hayward Sowers, Cary, Me.

Charlotte, N. C.—"I was in bad health for two years, with pains in both sides and was very nervous. If I even lifted a chair it would cause a hemorrhage. I had a growth which the doctor said was a tumor and I never would get well unless I had an operation. A friend advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and I gladly say that I am now enjoying fine health and am the mother of a nice baby girl. You can use this letter to help other suffering women."—Mrs. Rosa Sims, 16 Wyona St., Charlotte, N. C.

Now answer this question if you can. Why should a woman submit to a surgical operation without first giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial? You know that it has saved many others—why should it fail in your case?

For 30 years Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been the standard remedy for female ills. No one sick with woman's ailments does justice to herself if she does not try this famous medicine made from roots and herbs, it has restored so many suffering women to health.



Write to LYDIA E. PINKHAM MEDICINE CO. (CONFIDENTIAL) LYNN, MASS., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

Why He Changed His Mind.

John L. Sullivan met with some amusing incidents while giving boxing lessons.

One day a husky young man came to him as a pupil. He took his boxing lesson and went home somewhat the worse for wear.

When he came for his second lesson he said: "Mr. Sullivan, it was my idea to learn enough about boxing from you to give a certain young gentleman a good licking. I've had it in for him a good while. But I've changed my mind. If you have no objections I'll send this young man down here to you to take the rest of my lessons for me."—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

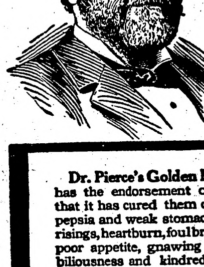
Invalid Men and Women

I will give you FREE a sample of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets that have brought health and happiness to thousands—also a book on any chronic disease requested.



During many years of practice I have used numerous combinations of curative medicines for liver ills. I have kept a record of the result in case after case, so that my staff of physicians and surgeons, at the Invalids' Hotel, Buffalo, N. Y., are able to diagnose and treat cases at a distance with uniform good results.

But for the permanent relief of blood disorders and impurities, I can recommend my "Golden Medical Discovery" a blood medicine without alcohol or other injurious ingredients.

R. V. PIERCE, M.D., Buffalo, N.Y.

Nature's Way Is The Best

Buried deep in our American forest we find bloodroot, queen's root, mandrake and stone root, golden seal, Oregon grape root and cherrybark. Of these Dr. R. V. Pierce made a pure glyceric extract which has been favorably known for over forty years. He called it "GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY." This "Discovery" purifies the blood and tones up the stomach and the entire system in Nature's own way. It's just the tissue builder and tonic you require.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery has the endorsement of many thousands that it has cured them of indigestion, dyspepsia and weak stomach, attended by sour risings, heartburn, foul breath, coated tongue, poor appetite, gnawing feeling in stomach, biliousness and kindred derangements of the stomach, liver and bowels.

"In coughs and hoarseness caused by bronchial, throat and lung affections, except consumption, the 'Golden Medical Discovery' is a most efficient remedy, especially in those obstinate, hang-on-coughs caused by irritation and congestion of the bronchial mucous membranes. The 'Discovery' is not so good for acute coughs arising from sudden colds, nor must it be expected to cure consumption in its advanced stages—no medicine will do that—but for all the obstinate, chronic coughs, which, if neglected, or badly treated, lead up to consumption, it is the best medicine that can be taken."

The STOLEN SINGER

by MARTHA BELLINGER

COPYRIGHT 1911 THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

Agatha Redmond, opera singer, starting for an auto drive in New York, finds a stranger sent as her chauffeur. She is annoyed, but he remains. Leaving the car, she goes into the park to read the will of an old friend of her mother, who has left her property. There she is accosted by a stranger, who follows her to the auto, climbs in and chloroforms her.

CHAPTER II.—Continued.

So he remembered Clara Van Camp's advice, wrote the whole story to Aleck, and cast about for the one successful business chance in the four thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine bad ones—as the statistics have it.

He actually found it in shoes. Football muscle and grit went into the job of putting superior shoe on inferior foot, if necessary—at least on some foot. He got a chance to try his powers in the home branch of a manufacturing house, and made good. When he came to fill a position where there was opportunity to try new ideas, he tried them. He inspected tanneries and stockyards. He got composite measurements of all the feet in all the women's colleges in the year ninety-seven, he drilled salesmen and opened a night school for the buttonhole-makers, he made scientific study of heels, and he invented an aristocratic arch and put it on the market.

The family joked about his doings as the harmless experiments of a lively boy, but presently they began to enjoy his income. Through it all they were affectionate and kind, with the matter-of-course fondness which a family gives to the members that takes the part of useful drudge. John, the pet of the parents, married, and had his own eyes opened, it is to be supposed. Donald, the genius, had just arrived, after a dozen years or so, at the stage where he was mentioned now and then in the literary journals. But Jim stuck to shoes and kept the family on a fair tide of modest prosperity.

Once, in the years of Jim's apprenticeship to life, there came over him a fit of soul-sickness that nearly proved his ruin.

"I can't stand this," he wrote to Aleck Van Camp; "it's too hard and dry and sordid for any man that's got a soul. It isn't the grind I mind, though that is bar enough; it is the 'Commercial Idea' that eats into a man's innards. He forgets there are things that money can't buy, and in his heart he grows contemptuous of anything to be had 'without money and without price.' He can't help it. If he is thinking of trade nine-tenths of the time, his mind gets set that way. I'm ready any minute to jump the fence, like father's old colt up on the farm. I'm not a snob, but I recognize now that there was some reason for all our old Hambleton ancestors being so finicky about trade.

"Do you remember how we used to talk, when we were kiddies, about keeping our ideals? Well, I believe I'm bankrupt, Aleck, in my account with ideals. I don't want to howl, and these remarks don't go with anybody else, but I can say to you, I want them back again."

Aleck did as a kiddie should do, writing much advice on long sheets of paper, and illustrating his points richly, like a good Scotchman, with scientific instances. A month or two later he contrived to have work to do in Boston, so that he could go out to Lynn and look up Jimmy's case. He even devised a cure by creating, in his mind, an office in the biological world which was to be offered to James on the ground that science needed just his abilities and training. But when Aleck arrived in Lynn he found that Jim, in some fashion or other, had found a cure for himself. He was deeper than ever in the business, and yet, in some spiritual sense, he had found himself. He had captured his ideal again and yoked it to duty—which is a great feat.

After twelve years of ferocious labor, with no vacations to speak of, James' mind took a turn for the worse. Physically he was as sound as a bell, though of lath-like thinness; but an effervescing in his blood lured his mind away from the study of lasts and accounts and Parisian models and sent it careering, like Satan, up and down the earth. Romance, which had been drugged during the transition from youth to manhood, awoke and coaxed for its rights, and whispered temptingly in an ear not yet dulled to its voice. Freedom, open spaces, laughter, the fresh sweep of the wind, the high buccaneering piracy of life and joy—these things beglamoured his senses.

So one day he locked his desk with a final click. The business was in good shape. It is but justice to say that if it had not been, Romance had dangled her luring wisp o' light in vain. Several of his new schemes had worked out well, his subordinates were of one mind with him, trade was flourishing. He felt he could afford a little spin.

Jimsy's radiating fancies focussed themselves, at last, on the vision of a trig little sail-boat, "a jug of wine, a loaf of bread" in the cabin, with possibly a book of verses underneath the bow, or more suitably, in the shadow of the sail; and Aleck Van Camp and himself astir in the rigging or plunging together from the gunwale for an early swim. "And before I get off, I'll hear a singer that can sing," he declared.

He telegraphed Aleck, who was by this time running down the eyelid of the squid, to meet him at his club in New York. Then he made short work with the family. Experience had taught him that an attack from ambush was most successful.

"Look here, Edith"—this was at the breakfast-table the very morning of his departure. Edith was sixteen, the tallest girl in the academy, almost ready for college and reckoned quite a queen in her world—"You be good and do my chores for me while I'm away, and I'll bring you home a duke. Take care of mother's bronchitis, and keep the house straight. I'm going on a cruise."

"All right, Jim"—Edith could always be counted on to catch the ball—"go ahead and have a bully time and don't drown yourself. I'll drive the team straight to water, mother and dad and the whole outfit, trust me!"

Considering the occasion and the correctness of the sentiments, Jim forbore, for once, from making the daily suggestion that she chasten her language. By the time the family appeared, Jim had laid out a rigid course of action for Miss Edith, who rose to the occasion like a soldier.

"Mother'll miss you, of course, but Jack and Harold"—two of Edith's admirers—"Jack and Harold can come around every day—stout arm to lean upon, that sort of thing. You know mother can't be a bit jolly without plenty of men about, and since Sue became engaged she really doesn't count. The boys will think they are running things, of course, but they'll see my iron hand in the velvet glove—you can throw a blue chip on that, Jimsy. And don't kiss me, Jim, for Dorothy Snell and I vowed, when we wished each other's rings on—Oh, well, brothers don't count."

And so, amid the farewells of a tender, protesting family, he got off, leaving Edith in the midst of one of her monologues.

There was a telegram in New York saying that Aleck Van Camp would join him in three days, at the latest. Hambleton disliked the club and left it, although his first intention had been to put up there. He picked out a modest, up-town hotel, new to him, for no other reason than that it had a pretty name, The Larue. Then he began to consider details.

The day after his arrival was occupied in making arrangements for his boat. He put into this matter the same painstaking buoyancy that he had put into a dull business for twelve years. He changed his plans half a dozen times, and exceeded them wholly in the size and equipment of the little vessel, and in the consequent expense; but he justified himself, as men will, by a dozen good reasons. The trig little sail-boat turned out to be a respectable yacht, steam, at that. She was called the Sea Gull. Neat in the beam, stanch in the bows, rigged for coasting and provided with a decent living outfit, she was "good enough for any gentleman," in the opinion of the agent who rented her. Jim was half ashamed at giving up the more robust scheme of sailing his own boat, with Aleck; but some vague and expansive spirit moved him "to see," as he said, "what it would be like to go as far and as fast as we please." While they were about it, they would call on some cousins at Bar Harbor and get good fun out of it.

The idea of his holiday grew as he played with it. As his spin took on a more complicated character, his zest rose. He went forth on Sunday feeling as if some vital change was impending. His little cruise loomed up large, important, epochal. He laughed at himself and thought, with his customary optimism, that a vacation was worth waiting twelve years for, if waiting endowed it with such a flavor. Jim knew that Aleck would relish the spin, too. Aleck's nature was that of a grind tempered with sportiness. Jim sat down Sunday morning and wrote out the whole program for Aleck's endorsement, sent the letter by special delivery and went out to reconnoiter.

The era of Sunday orchestral concerts had begun, but that day, to Jim's regret, the singer was not a contralto. "Dramatic Soprano" was on the program; a new name, quite unknown to Jim. His interest in the soloist waned, but the orchestra was enough. He thanked Heaven that he was past the primitive stage of thinking any single voice more interesting than the assemblage of instruments known as orchestra.

Hambleton found a place in the dim vastness of the hall, and sank into his seat in a mood of vivid anticipation. The instruments twanged, the audience gathered, and at last the music began. Its first effect was to rouse Hambleton to a sharp attention to details—the director, the people in the orchestra, the people in the boxes; and then he settled down, thinking his thoughts. The past, the future, life and its meaning, love and its power, the long, long thoughts of youth and ambition and desire came flocking to his brain. The noble confluence of sound that is music worked upon him its immemorial miracle; his heart softened, his imagination glowed, his spirit stirred. Time was lost to him—and earth.

The orchestra ceased, but Hambleton did not heed the commotion about him. The pause and the fresh beginning of the strings scarcely disturbed his ecstatic reverie. A deep hush lay upon the vast assemblage, broken only by the voices of the violins. And then, in the zone of silence that lay over the listening people—silence that vibrated to the memory of the strings—there rose a little song. To Hambleton, sitting absorbed, it was as if the circuit which galvanized him into life had suddenly been completed. He sat up. The singer's lips were slightly parted, and her voice at first was no more than the half-voice of a flute, sweet, gentle, beguiling. It was borne upward on the crest of the melody, fuller and fuller, as on a flooding tide.

"Free of my pain, free of my burden of sorrow,
At last I shall see thee—"

There was freedom in the voice, and the sense of space, of wind on the waters, of life and the love of life.

Jimsy was a soft-hearted fellow. He never knew what happened to him; but after uncounted minutes he seemed to be choking, while the orchestra and the people in boxes and the singer herself swam in a hazy distance. He shook himself, called somebody he knew very well an idiot, and laughed aloud in his joy; but his laugh did not matter, for it was drowned in the roar of applause that reached the roof.

Jim did not applaud. He went out doors to think about it; and after a time he found, to his surprise, that he could recall not only the song, but the singer, quite distinctly. It was a tall, womanly figure, and a fair, bright face framed abundantly with dark hair, and the least little humorous twitch to her lips. And her name was Agatha Redmond.

"Of course, she can sing; but it isn't like having the real thing—'tisn't an alto," said Jimsy ungratefully and just from habit.

The day's experience filled his thoughts and quieted his restlessness. He awaited Aleck with entire patience. Monday morning he spent in small necessary business affairs, securing, among other things, several hundred dollars, which he put in his money-belt. About the middle of the afternoon he left his hotel, engaged a taxicab and started for Riverside. The late summer day was fine, with the afternoon haze settling over river and town. He watched the procession of carriages, the horseback riders, the people afoot, the children playing on the grass, with a feeling of comradeship. Was he not also tasting freedom—a lord of the earth? His gaze traveled out to the river, with the glimmer here and there of a tug-boat, a little steamer, or the white sail of a pleasure craft. The blood of some seagoing ancestor stirred in his veins and he thrilled at the thought of the days to come when his prow should be headed offshore.

The taxicab had its limitations, and Hambleton suddenly became impatient of its monotonous slithering along the firm road. Telling the driver to follow him, he descended and crossed to where Cathedral Parkway switches off. He walked briskly, feeling the tonic of the sea air, and circled the cathedral, where workmen were lounging away after their day's toil. The unfinished edifice loomed up like a giant skeleton of some prehistoric era, and through its mighty open arches and buttresses Jim saw fleecy clouds scudding across the western sky. A stone saint, muffled in burlap, had just been swung up into his windy niche, but had not yet discarded his robes of the world. Hambleton was regarding the shapeless figure with mild interest, wondering which saint of the calendar could look so grotesque, when a sound drew his attention sharply to earth. It was a small sound, but there was something strange about it. It was startling as a flash in a summer sky.

Besides the workmen, there was no living thing in sight on the hillside except his own taxicab, swinging slowly up the avenue at that moment, and a covered motor-car getting up speed a square away. Even as the car approached, Hambleton decided that the strange sound had proceeded from its ambushed tonneau; and it was, surely, a human voice of distress. He stepped forward to the curb. The car was upon him, then lumbered heavily and swiftly past. But on the instant of its passing there appeared, beneath the lifted curtain and quite near his own face, the face of the singer of yesterday; and from pale, agonized lips, as if with dying breath, she cried, "Help, help!"

Hambleton knew her instantly, although the dark abundance of her hair was almost lost beneath hat and flowing veil, and the bright, humorous expression was blotted out by fear. He stood for a moment rooted to the curb, watching the dark mass of the car as it swayed down the hill. Then he beckoned sharply to his driver, met the taxicab half way, and pointed to the disappearing machine.

"Quick! Can you overtake it?"

"I'd like nothing better than to run down one o' them Dook machines!" said the driver.

CHAPTER III.

Midsummer Madness.

The driver of the taxicab proved to be a sound sport.

Five minutes of luck, aided by nerve, brought the two machines somewhat nearer together. The motor-car gained in the open spaces, the taxicab caught up when it came to weaving its way in and out and dodging the trolleys. At the frequent moments when he appeared to be losing the car, Hambleton reflected that he had its number, which might lead to something. At the Waldorf the car slowed up, and the cab came within a few yards. Hambleton made up his mind at that instant that he had been mistaken in his supposition of trouble threatening the lady, and looked momently to see her step from the car into the custody of those starched and lacquered menials who guard the portals of fashionable hotels.

But it was so. A signal was interchanged between the occupants of the car and some watcher in the doorway, and the car sped on. Hambleton, watching steadily, wondered.

"If she is being kidnaped, why doesn't she make somebody hear? Plenty of chance. They couldn't have killed her—that isn't done."

And yet his heart smote him as he remembered the terror and distress written on that countenance and the cry for help.

"Something was the matter," memory insisted. "There they go west; west Tenth, Alexander Street, Tenth Avenue—"

The car lumbered on, the cab half a block, often more, in the rear, through endless regions of small shops and offices huddled together above narrow sidewalks, through narrow and winding streets paved with cobblestones and jammed with cars and trucks, squeezing past curbs where dirty children sat playing within a few inches of death-dealing wheels. Hambleton wondered what kept them from being killed by hundreds daily, but the wonder was immediately forgotten in a new subject for thought. The cab had stopped, although several yards of clear road lay ahead of it. The driver was climbing down. The motor-car was nosing its way along nearly a block ahead. Hambleton leaped out.

"Of course, we've broken down?" he mildly inquired. Deep in his heart he was superstitiously thinking that he would let fate determine his next move; if there were obstacles in the way of his further quest, well and good; he would follow the Face no longer.

"If you'll wait just a minute—" the driver was saying, "until I get my kit out—"

But Hambleton, looking ahead, saw that the car had disappeared, and his mind suddenly veered.

"Not this time," he announced. "Here, the meter says four-twenty—you take this, I'm off." He put a five-dollar bill into the hand of the driver and started on an easy run toward the west.

He had caught sight of the smoke-stacks and masts in the near distance, telling him that the motor-car had almost, if not quite, reached the river. Such a vehicle could not disappear and leave no trace; it ought to be easy to find. Ahead of him flaring lights alternated with the steady, piercing brilliance of the incandescents, and both struggled against the lingering daylight.

A heavy policeman at the corner had seen the car. He pointed west into the cavernous darkness of the wharves.

"If she ain't down at the Imperial docks she's gone plump into the river for that's the way she went," he insisted. The policeman had the bearing of a major-general and the accent of the city of Cork. Hambleton went on past the curving street-car tracks, dodged a loaded dray emerging from the dock, and threaded his way under the shed. He passed piles of trunks, and a couple of truckmen dumping assorted freight from an ocean liner. No motor-car or veiled lady, nor sound of anything like a woman's voice. Hambleton came out into the street again, looked about for another probable avenue of escape for the car and was at the point of bafflement, when the major-general pounded slowly along his way.

"In there, my son, and no nice place either!" pointing to a smaller entrance alongside the Imperial docks, almost concealed by swinging signs. It was plainly a forbidden way, and at first sight appeared too narrow for the passage of any vehicle whatsoever. But examination showed that it was not too narrow; moreover, it opened on a level with the street.

"If you really want her, she's in there, though what'll be to pay if you go in there without a permit, I don't know. I'd hate to have to arrest you."

"It might be the best thing for me if you did, but I'm going in. You might wait here a minute, Captain, if you will."

"I will that; more especially as that car was a stunner for speed and I already had my eye on her. I'd like to see you fish her out of that hole."

But Hambleton was out of earshot and out of sight. An empty passage smelling of bilge-water and pent-up gases opened suddenly on to the larger dock. Damp flooring with wide cracks stretched off to the left; on the right the solid planking terminated suddenly in huge piles, against which the water, capped with scum and weeds, splashed fitfully. The river bank, lined with docks, seemed lulled into temporary quietness. Ferry-boats steamed at their labors farther up and down the river, but the currents of travel left here and there a peaceful quarter such as this.

Hambleton's gaze searched the dock and the river in a rapid survey. The dock itself was dim and vast, with a few workmen looking like ants in the distance. It offered nothing of encouragement; but on the river, fifty yards away, and getting farther away every minute, was a yacht's tender. The figures of the two rowers were quite distinct, their oars making rhythmical flashes over the water, but it was impossible to say exactly what freight, human or otherwise, it carried. It was evident that there were people aboard, possibly several. Even as Hambleton strained his eyes to see, the outlines of the rowboat merged into the dimness. It was pointed like a gun toward a large yacht lying at ancher further out in the stream. The vessel swayed prettily to the current, and slowly swung its dim light from the masthead.

"They've got her—out in that boat," said Hambleton to himself, feeling, while the words were on his lips, that he was drawing conclusions unwarranted by the evidence. Thus he stood, one foot on the slippery log siding of the dock, watching while the little drama played itself out, so far as his present knowledge could go. His judgment still hung in suspense, but his senses quickened themselves to detect, if possible, what the outcome might be. He saw the tender approach the boat, lie alongside; saw one sailor after another descend the rope ladder, saw a limp, inert mass lifted from the rowboat and carried up, as if it had been merchandise, to the deck of the yacht; saw two men follow the limp bundle over the gunwale; and finally saw the boat herself drawn up and placed in her davits. Hambleton's mind at last slid to its conclusion, like a bolt into its socket.

"They're kidnaping her, without a doubt," he said slowly. For a moment he was like one struck stupid. Slowly he turned to the dock, looking up and down its orderly but unprepossessing clutter. Dim lights shone here and there, and a few hands were at work at the farther end. The dull silence, the unresponsive preoccupation of whatever life was in sight, made it all seem as remote from him and from this tragedy as from the stars.

In fact, it was impersonal and remote to such a degree that Hambleton's practical mind halted yet an instant, in doubt whether there were not some plausible explanation. The thought came back to him suddenly that the motor-car must be somewhere in the neighborhood if his conclusion were correct.

Steam for the Soil.

For a year or two past certain growers of tomatoes, cucumbers and similar vegetables for the London market have been injecting steam into the soil with a view to destroying insects and slugs. It is reported that the plan works very well for that purpose, but the operation brought to light an unexpected fact—namely, that the soil thus treated increased greatly in fertility; so greatly, indeed, that the ordinary amount of manure cannot be used afterward.

This effect has been explained as being due to the sterilization produced by the steam, which kills the phagocytes or protozoa which in ordinary circumstances keep down the number of bacteria in the soil whose operations are beneficent in turning organic nitrogen into plant food.—Harper's Weekly.

WILL FIGHT PIRATES

Philippine Government Is Building Navy to Suppress Outlaws

Moros of Sulu Island Still Raid Neighbors to Replenish Stock of Provisions and Fill Harems With Slave Girls.

Manila, P. I.—Piracy has again broken out in the Philippines. The Moros of the Sulu islands have taken up their old pastime of raiding their neighbors to replenish their stock of provisions, to fill their harems with slave girls and to get other slaves to till their farms. They are doing today what they have done for centuries past, only in a smaller way. So soon as the heavy hand of Uncle Sam is lifted, as it was recently when the government withdrew some of the gunboats that had been patrolling the islands for the purpose of suppressing piracy, the Moro pirates immediately got busy and started out in their praus with the familiar skull and crossbones tacked to the masthead.

To provide for future emergencies of the kind the Philippine government is now proceeding to build a little navy of its own. Plans have been made for the building of a number of revenue cutters, to be operated along the lines now followed by the revenue cutter service of the United States. In the Philippines the principal work of the new service will be that of protecting the people of the islands from the piratical raids of the Sulu Moros. A contract has been let for the building of the first vessel, which will cost about $100,000. This vessel when finished will carry a number of rapid-fire guns and two speedy motorboats. All of the new vessels of the miniature navy will be equipped with motorboats, so that they may be used in pursuit of the buccaneers when they seek to escape by sailing their light draft craft into shallow creeks and rivers where they cannot be followed by larger vessels.

Col. Hugh L. Scott, of the Third Cavalry, was the man given the task of suppressing piracy in the Sulu islands. He held the job of governor from 1903 to 1906.

It was not long after he took charge that a number of hostile chiefs of Jolo, who at different times had tried to raise the other tribes against American control, were one by one subdued, mostly by the great force of personality of Colonel Scott and his tactful handling of the natives. During his campaign against the pirate Panglima Hassan he was terribly wounded at a fight near Crater Lake. Although his wounded hands had to be strapped to his breast while his pony was led by an orderly, he remained only a few days in the hospital, and again took the field in the chase after Hassan. His wounds were open for more than three months, but, notwithstanding all this, he kept on the train until he ran down the fanatic and killed him. As a reward he was recalled from the Philippines, and in 1906 made superintendent of the military academy at West Point.

Colonel Scott believes that this new plan of maintaining revenue cutters in the Philippines will be more effective against piracy than any yet tried.

SICK MAN BATTLES WITH LION

Shot Beast Three Times Before It Dropped Fifty Feet From Him—Battle Occurs at Hecla, Wyo.

Cheyenne, Wyo.—Battling with one of the largest mountain lions ever seen in this section, George Fisher, a sufferer from tuberculosis shot and killed the animal, weighing 275 pounds, which he found feeding on a steer. The battle occurred at Hecla, in Laramie county.

Fisher shot at the animal, wounding it. The lion at once gave up his beef and started for Fisher in leaps.

The man retreated, sending another bullet into the beast. While it seemed to take effect, it did not stop the lion. A third bullet entered the animal's head, and as it was within 50 feet of Fisher it dropped dead.

Marriage Tangles Relationship.

Poole, Pa.—By the marriage of Noel Garrad and Miss Mary Collins, and Daniel O. Mellen and Miss Nola Gentry, all of Poole, Pa., a curious tangle in relationship was brought about. Garrad is the uncle of his wife's cousin, as well as a cousin by marriage. His wife is the aunt by marriage to the husband of her cousin.

The matter of reapportionment is one of the big issues now before the legislature and there is going to be a warm fight which may result in some kind of a reapportionment bill being passed.

Members of the legislature from this district are all pledged to work for amendments to the present inadequate and iniquitous drainage laws, and the people of this district should see to it that they make some strenuous efforts along that line.

Judge Archbold has been found guilty of "high crime and misdemeanors" by the senate of the United states and has been stripped of his office and disbarred from ever holding office in the country again. All of which means that Judge Archbold was a grafters—and there are others Judges on the federal bench who are in the same class. Hope they get 'em all.

At a banquet in Roseau last week Bro. R. J. Bell, of the Roseau Times, was presented with a handsome silver water set by the other members ot the Roseau County Editorial Association, of which he is president. Bro. Bell has been one of the bright lights among the northern editors for a long time, and has always been willing to allow his neighbors and competitors the privilege of making a living as well as himself. Men of his stamp are not always appreciated as they ought to be and it is good to know that Bro. Bell is appreciated. May he live long and prosper.

The Stephen Leader puts up some howl because the county printing was let last week to a combination of newspayers of which it was not a member. The action of the board gives the taxpayers of part of the county a fair service at a high price. We are very much in favor of fair prices, and to get fair prices, we favor combinations sometime if necessary. But in this particular combination there are some who would cheerfully cut prices on some of the other work below cost in order to beat their neighbors out of a chance to make a living. There isn't much clean character in a man who will do work for outsiders for less than cost and graft enough out of the county to make up the deficit.

ONCE PARTS OF A METEOR

Component Parts of Diamonds Have Thus Been Traced by Investigating Scientists.

It is perhaps not generally known that the "blue stuff" in which diamonds are found in South America is the disintegrates and disorganized mass of vast meteor that once fell from the sky. A decomposed meteor of immense size is reported to have been found in Arizona. It contains iron, nickel, platinum and diamonds. It is supposed to have been, before it decomposed, 500 feet in diameter and to have weighed several hundred million tons. They may be fragments of comets and finding themselves under the influence of the attraction of gravitation of our earth they fell upon it.

The theory is that their speed may be as high as forty or fifty miles a second. If it be a strong meteor it may be crushed into a dust by the air pressure in front of it. Even if of iron it may be torn into fragments as if an explosion had occurred in front. If, however, it is a rounded piece of iron like this lump, then it would take a tremendous pressure of air to crush it, and there is no doubt whatever that most iron meteors of rounded form would escape fracture unless they were moving at the very highest speeds.

At such speeds the air pressure developed in front of them may blow them to pieces, but if they are moving, say one-third as fast, they may, and probably will, survive unless they succumb to another action, which takes place with iron—namely, combustion.

The city chap who had hired out as extra farm hand during the harvest was not quite able to respond to the 4 o'clock pounding on his bedroom door the first morning as promptly as he had anticipated. He lingered with the pillows for a quarter of an hour past the appointed time and then dragged himself out, and by half-past 4 he was stumbling across the field where the old farmer was hard at work.

"Fine morning," said the newcomer briskly.

Little Girl Died Suddenly

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Gabrielson, of Mud Lake township, are called upon to mourn the loss of their little 5-yr-old daughter, Ora Lenora, who died at Thief River Falls on Tuesday night, of peritonitis. She had been ailing only a few days and was taken to Thief River Falls Tuesday for hospital care. Her disease had too strong a hold, and she died shortly after her arrival there. The body was brought home next morning for interment.

Ernie Peachie was in from the east on Thursday and went to Middle River on business.

WANTED—A good load of hay and one of oat straw at this office. First come gets the money.

Axel Nelson returned Tuesday from a trip to Alexandria where he visited relatives and did a little stroke of business.

Engebret Moe came in from his Mud Lake homestead Tuesday and went down to Thief River Falls on business.

Mrs. Gust Peterson returned home to Stratcona on Thursday after several days spent visiting at the Herman Heinze home.

Christ Yven and aunt, Mrs. Knutson, left on Thursday for Grafton, N. D., where they intend to spend a week or so visiting with relatives.

Moving into our new office and an unexpected rush of work prevented us from getting the paper out just on time this week, and also forces us to leave out considerable news.

Haakon Swenson, one of the old time residents of this vicinity, died at his home two miles east of town last night. He had been ill for a long time and was over 70 years of age.

P. C. Rosand came in from Mud Lake on Tuesday and left on a business trip for points in the Duluth country. He reports that Mrs. Rosand has been laid up for several weeks with an injured knee, but is now progressing favorably towards recovery.

AUTOMATISM.

The extraordinary plea of "automatism"—the doing of acts without consciousness thereof on the part of the doer—was recently set up in England in the case of a culprit who had stolen a motor car. A London mental expert testified that a person in the condition in which he found the prisoner could perform complicated mental and physical actions of which he would have no recollection on recovering his normal state. The accused declared that he had no recollection of anything that had happened during an entire month until he found himself in a prison cell. The judge did not take kindly to the new defense, and citing the dual personality of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, uttered the dictum that if Hyde had committed a murder, which by definition implies previous intention, Dr. Jekyll would have been hanged for it. The culprit was sentenced to four months in prison.

MADE THEM TIRED.

"That alarm clock of yours makes me tired," said the boarder to the man who occupied the adjoining room.

"Me, too," replied the owner of the clock; "whenever I hear it I feel like going to sleep."

REAL TROUBLE.

She—Don't you hate those women who try to act like men?

He—Yes, so few of them try to act like gentlemen.

SOLDIERS ALL LOVED "WALT"

John Burroughs Tells of First Meeting Whitman When He Was an Army Nurse.

It was at Washington that John Burroughs and Walt Whitman met. Their first meeting was outdoors, and as our best-beloved interpreter of nature tells it to a New York Sun interviewer, we perceive anew what manner of man Whitman was, how genuine and lovable in his simplicity and friendliness.

At the close of a spring day in 1864 young Burroughs was introduced to Whitman, then an army nurse, at the corner of Fourteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue. General Burnside's old Ninth corps was marching through the capital on its way to adventures in the Wilderness, where Grant's army was face to face with Lee's.

"As the ranks of blue swept steadily past us," said Mr. Burroughs, "I noticed a break in one of the companies, and in a moment three or four soldiers were crowding around my new friend, calling him 'Walt,' throwing their arms round his neck, and begging him to go with them a little way.

"Whitman, with his arms flung across blue shoulders, would walk a short distance and then rejoin me. This happened time after time. The men who broke ranks were those to whom Whitman had ministered in the hospitals.

"He had done domestic tasks for them, had written home, had eased anxieties and cheered the downhearted, and as he moved serene and comforting down the rows of cots, the men had come to know and love him with the deepest sort of love.

"Why," concluded Mr. Burroughs, "several of the men who were marching out into the thick of the fight actually kissed Whitman, and almost wept when he had to drop back and leave them."—Youth's Companion.

NEW FOUL BLOW.

Jay Brady, manager of the Colonial theater in Chicago, had a darky stage hand working for him who fancied himself a boxer. A match was arranged between the ambitious scene shifter and a semi-professional fighter, also a negro.

For a joke, Jay agreed to act as second of the Colonial's champion. Everything went well in the first round; but in the second the semi-professional dealt his adversary a terrific blow on the side of the head. As the stage hand staggered back against the ropes he yelled out:

"Mistah Brady! Mistah Brady, you kin claim a foul on dat! Dat niggah done hit me a deliberit brain blow!"

WILLING TO OBLIGE.

"Do you believe kisses can be sterilized, professor?" asked the sweet young thing.

"Well," replied the professor, "if you will give me one I'll see what I can do with it, miss."

ORIGINAL WAY.

"There is one thing I'll bet a chaperon never did."

"What's that?"

"Put the 'prim' in the primitive life."

ACCOUNTED FOR.

"Women very seldom get a good grasp to last on things."

"No married man would say that unless he kept his hair cropped."

WASTED.

"That man has a powerful but a coarse voice."

"Yes, it is a pity he can't use its hoarse power in his business."

ALL RIGHT.

"I suppose the price of bread will go up, too."

"Well, you know bread is never good unless it rises."

TO CEASE MONEY TRUST PROBE

CHAIRMAN PUJO DECLARES BODY LACKS POWER.

Banks Doubtful as to Right to Inquire Into Their Internal Affairs.

Washington, Jan. 20.—Hearings of the house money trust committee will be suspended next week, Friday or Saturday, according to an announcement by Representative Pujo, chairman of the committee, who assigned as the principal reason for the suspension the doubt cast upon the power of the committee to inquire into the internal affairs of banking institutions.

"This action," said Representative Pujo, in a statement explaining the announcement, "is due mainly to the doubt cast by the banks upon the power of the committee to inquire into their internal affairs and especially to their refusal to disclose the names of individual loans and borrowers of upwards of $1,000,000, which would affect only 13 institutions in the United States.

"Without this information and in the absence of means of ascertaining the character of business done by the banks that have made huge profits in a comparatively short time, it is manifestly impossible for the committee to ascertain whether—and if so to what extent—these banks and their funds have been and are being used by the great financial interests in the furtherance of their schemes or to the exclusion of competing business."

In announcing the suspension of the oral hearings, Chairman Pujo points out that there are still upwards of 40 witnesses on the committee's list who have not yet been examined and many important subjects bearing on the inquiry that have not been touched upon.

"The work delegated to the committee is, however, far from completed," said Mr. Pujo. "In some of its most important aspects it has barely begun, but if it is to be continued, this important task, in order to be thoroughly discharged, must be accompanied with far more comprehensive powers, which can only be had through further legislation."

The committee will adjourn to Feb. 25 to consider its report. Some further formal documentary proof then may be introduced to be embodied in the report.

POINCARE ELECTED

PREMIER CHOSEN OVER PAMS ON SECOND BALLOT AT NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

IS THE NINTH PRESIDENT

Threats of Duel Between Poincare and and Clemenceau Add to Excitement—Vote 483 to 296.

Paris, Jan. 18.—M. Raymond Poincare, premier, was elected ninth president of the third republic of France to succeed President Armand Fallieres, yesterday.

Poincare was chosen on the second ballot by a vote of 483 to 296 for Jules Pams amid scenes of the wildest confusion, after he had challenged to a duel M. Georges Clemenceau, a former premier, and after a second duel challenge had been sent by Deputy Mojzie, a Poincare supporter, to former Minister Boncour, an adherent of M. Jules Pams, secretary of agriculture.

Pams Was Worst Rival.

Pams proved to be Poincare's most serious rival, but he was more than 100 votes behind the premier on the first ballot. The result of the second ballot was: Raymond Poincare, 483; Jules Pams, 296; Marie Eduard Vaillant, 69. Necessary to election, 435 votes.

Premier Poincare obtained 429 votes on the first ballot and Jules Pams 327, the details of the ballot follows:

Raymond Poincare, 429; Jules Pams, 327; Marie Eduard Vaillant, 63; Paul Deschanel, 18; Felix Ribot, 16; Leon Bourgeois, 4; Alexandre Millerand, 3; Alfred Mascuraud, 2; Theophile Delcasse, 2; Antonin Dubost, 1; Henri Rochefort, 1; blanks, 5.

Raymond Poincare, the new president of the French republic, is one of the ablest men who have participated in politics in France within recent years. He is in his fifty-third year and has been in politics since his early youth, having been elected deputy in 1887.

In Many Cabinets.

President Poincare has been in many French cabinets, having served as minister of agriculture, minister of public instruction, minister of finance, and as premier. He was vice president of the chamber of deputies for four years. He became premier and minister of foreign affairs on Jan. 14, 1912.

M. Poincare is a lawyer by profession. He is also a prolific author and is a member of the French academy, which gives him rank as an "immortal." He made a great personal sacrifice when he became premier, for he gave up an extremely lucrative law practice. His eloquence is a proverb in France, and even his strongest political opponents express confidence in the honesty of his purposes.

President Poincare's father was a prominent public official and one of his brothers also occupies a high post in the government service. Mme. Poincare was Mlle. Henrietta Denucci, an Italian.

Won't Expose Pals.

Chicago, Jan. 20.—"This life of a hold-up man isn't what a fellow might think it was," observed James B. Perry, confessed leader of a gang of automobile bandits that has been operating in Chicago for two months, after being questioned further by Police Captain Lavin. "And the worst of it is that we all get caught sooner or later." Perry stubbornly refused to divulge the names of his companions, declaring he was willing to hang if it be so decreed, but that he would not "snitch."

U. S. TO FIGHT OIL LAND TITLE

GOVERNMENT CONTENDS THAT CLAIMS ARE ILLEGAL.

Suit Involves Millions of Dollars and And Many Thousands of Acres.

Washington, Jan. 20.—A suit which will test the title of hundreds of thousands of acres of oil lands in the west, with values running into the millions, will be filed at Los Angeles, Cal., by the federal government within a few days.

Assistant Attorney General Knaebel has instructed United States Attorney McCormick at Los Angeles to begin proceedings against all the claimants to 160 acres of oil lands in southern California, said to be worth $5,000 an acre. Other suits will follow, all of them testing the legality of the extensive oil land withdrawal made by President Taft Sept. 27, 1909.

When questions were raised as to the president's power to make the withdrawal, congress gave him specific authority by the act of June 25, 1910, and President Taft again withdrew the lands July 2, 1910. Between the first and second withdrawals, however, many claims were filed for the lands under the mineral law. The government holds that the first withdrawal, as well as the second, was legal and that the title to these valuable tracts is lodged with the United States.

Not only will the government ask the court to declare valid its title to the land, but it also will seek recoveries for all the oil which is said to have been withdrawn, the exact quantity of which must be developed by the suit.

The proceedings at Los Angeles, it is understood, will be directed against all those who have claimed or still claim title to the land, those who have purchased it.

The interior department has refused to grant patents on any of the lands and there are said to be many conflicting claims among the persons who base their contentions upon placer mining locations.

Darrow on Trial Again.

Los Angeles, Jan. 20.—Clarence S. Darrow, once tried and acquitted on the charge of having bribed a juror in the McNamara case, faces trial again on a similar accusation. The second trial is expected to occupy much less time than the first, which lasted 95 days. There was a much changed court personnel when the case was called in the superior court. Governor Johnson has designated Judge W. M. Conley of Madera county to hear the case.

New York Woman Disappears.

Rome, Jan. 20.—Mrs. William Mansfield of New York mysteriously disappeared on Jan. 5 from Salo on Lake Garda where she arrived before Christmas. She stopped at the Hotel Victoria and left on the morning boat for Desenzane. She intended to go to Verona and return on the same evening. She has not been heard from since. The woman's husband is in America but his address is unknown.

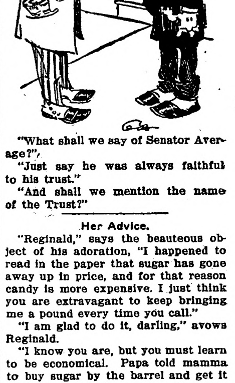
THE BAROMETER OF THE POST OFFICE, THE READING OF WHICH SHOWS WESTERN CANADA'S GROWTH.

Several of Western Canada newspapers coming to hand during the last part of the year 1912 contained items of news such as the following, speaking of the Christmas work in the postoffice:

"Other years have been heavy and the employees have had plenty of opportunity of learning what it was to work overtime, but the past has had nothing equal to the present. Forty extra men have been employed (in Winnipeg), and mail trains have been run special. The increase in the mail this year has been due to the enormous influx of people into Western Canada during the season, and also the general prosperity which the prairie provinces have enjoyed. To the latter cause has been due the heavy increase in the number of parcels which have been shipped to the old country and Eastern Canada."

The above extract taken from a Winnipeg paper gives a fair idea of the great work that the Canadian postoffices have had all through the western prairies. During the past year hundreds of new postoffices were established, many of them at remote points from the railway, but all forced upon the country on account of the new settlements that have taken place during the year. It is said of the Canadian government that in its immigration and settlement policy there is nothing left undone to take care of the people and their welfare, whether it be in the new town along a new line of railway or in the remotest hamlet. This solicitude and care are not confined to the postoffice, but with every branch that has to do with organizing new districts. Bridges have been built, roads constructed, the district policed, and a dozen other things have to be done and are done. Is it any wonder that with the splendid land, the high yielding land, the land that is free to the homesteader or open to purchase at reasonable prices from the railway and land companies, that the Canadian immigration records for 1912 will show arrivals of upwards of 400,000, one-half of this being from the United States. The new literature being sent out by the immigration branch at Ottawa, and its agencies throughout the United States deals with many of the new and interesting features that will mark the work of that branch for the year 1913.—Advertisement.

JUST TRUST.



"What shall we say of Senator Average?"

"Just say he was always faithful to his trust."

"And shall we mention the name of the Trust?"

Her Advice.

"Reginald," says the beauteous object of his adoration, "I happened to read in the paper that sugar has gone away up in price, and for that reason candy is more expensive. I just think you are extravagant to keep bringing me a pound every time you call."

"I am glad to do it, darling," avows Reginald.

"I know you are, but you must learn to be economical. Papa told mamma to buy sugar by the barrel and get it cheaper, so maybe you would better buy candy for me the same way."

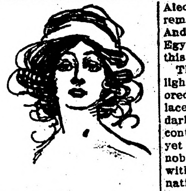
The STOLEN SINGER



by MARTHA BELLINGER

COPYRIGHT 1911 THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

Agatha Redmond, opera singer, starting for an auto drive in New York, finds a stranger sent as her chauffeur. She is annoyed, but he remains. Leaving the car, she goes into the park to read the will of an old friend of her mother, who has left her property. There she is accosted by a stranger, who follows her to the auto, climbs in and chloroforms her. James Hambleton of Lynn, Mass., member of an old New England family, decides he needs a holiday. He goes to New York and there witnesses the abduction of Agatha Redmond. Hambleton sees Agatha forcibly taken aboard a yacht.

CHAPTER III.—Continued.

On the instant his brain became active again. It did not take long, as a matter of fact, to find the car; though when he stumbled on it, turned about and neatly stowed away close beside the partitioning wall, he gave a start. It was such a tangible evidence of what had threatened to grow vague and unreal on his hands. He squeezed himself into the narrow space between it and the wall, finally thrusting his head under the curtains of the tonneau.

It was high and dry, empty as last year's cockleshell. Not a sign of life, not a loose object of any kind except a filmy thing which Hambleton found himself observing thoughtfully. At last he picked it up—a long, mist-like veil. He spread it out, held it gingerly between a thumb and finger of each hand, and continued to look at it abstractedly. Part of it was clean and whole, dainty as only a bit of woman's finery can be; but one end of it was torn and twisted and stretched out of all semblance to itself. Moreover, it was dirty, as if it had been ground under a muddy heel. It was, in its way, a shrieking evidence of violence, of unrighteous struggle. Hambleton folded the scarf carefully, with its edges together, and put it in his pocket.

Jimmy's actions from this time on had an incentive and a spirit that had before been lacking. He noted again the number of the car, and returned to the edge of the dock to observe the yacht. She had steamed up river a little way for some reason known only to herself, and was now turning very slowly. She was but faintly lighted and would pass for some pleasure craft just coming home. But Jim knew better. He could, at last, put two and two together. He would follow the Face—indeed, he could not help following it. In him had begun that divine experience of youth—of youth essentially, whether it come in early years or late—of being carried off his feet by a spirit not himself. He ran like a young athlete down the dock to the nearest workman, evolving schemes as he went.

The dock-hand apathetically trundled a small keg from one pile of freight to another, wiped his hands on his trousers, took a dry pipe out of his pocket, and looked vacantly up the river before he replied to Hambleton's question.

"Queer name—Jene Dark they call her."

It was like pulling teeth to get information out of him, but Jim applied the forceps.

The yacht had been lying out in the river for two weeks or more, possibly less; belonged to foreign parts; no one thereabouts knew who its owner was; nor its captain; nor its purpose in the harbor of New York. At last, quite gratuitously, the man volunteered a personal opinion. "Slippery boat in a gale—wouldn't trust her."

Hambleton walked smartly back, taking a look both at the yacht and the motor-car as he went. The yacht's nose pointed toward the Jersey shore; the car was creeping out of the dock. As he overtook the machine, he saw that it was in the hands of a mechanic in overalls and jumper. In answer to Hambleton's question as to the owner of the car, the mechanic told him pleasantly to go to the devil, and for once the sight of a coin failed to produce any perceptible effect. But the major-general, waiting half a block away, was still in the humor of giving fatherly advice. He welcomed Jim heartily.

"That's a hole I ain't got no use for. 'Ow'd you make out?"

"Well enough, for all present purposes. Can you undertake to do a job for me?"

"If it ain't nothing I'd have to arrest you for, I might consider it," he chuckled.

"I want you to go to the Laramie Club and tell Aleck Van Camp—got the name?—that Hambleton has gone off on the Jeanne D'Arc and may not be back for some time; and he is to look after the Sea Gull."

"Hold on, young man; you're not going to do anything out of reason, as she might say?"

"Oh, no, not at all; most reasonable thing in the world. You take this money and be sure to get the message to Mr. Van Camp, will you? All right. Now tell me where I can find a tug-boat or a steam launch, quick."

"O'Leary, down at pier X—2—O has launches and everything else. All right, my son, Aleck Van Camp, at the Laramie. But you be good and don't drown yourself."

This last injunction, word for word in the manner of the pert Edith, touched Jimmy's humor. He laughed ringingly. His spirit was like a chime of bells on a week-day.

The hour which followed was one that James Hambleton found it difficult to recall afterward, with any degree of coherence; but at the time his movements were mathematically accurate, swift, effective. He got aboard a little steam tug and followed the yacht down the river and into the harbor. As she stood out into the roads and began to increase her speed, he directed the captain of the tug to steam forward and make as if to cross her bows. This would make the pilot of the yacht angry, but he would be forced to slow down a trifle. Jim watched long enough to see the success of his maneuver, then went down into the cuddy which served as a cabin, took off his clothes, and looked to the fastenings of his money belt. Then he watched his chance, and when the tug was pretty nearly in the path of the yacht, he crept to the stern and dropped overboard.

CHAPTER IV.

Mr. Van Camp Makes a Call.

Aleck Van Camp turned from the clerk's desk, rather relieved to find that Hambleton had not yet made his appearance. Aleck had an errand on his mind, and he reflected that Jim was apt to be impetuous and reluctant to await another man's convenience; at least, Jim wouldn't perceive that another man's convenience needed to be waited for; and Aleck had no mind to announce this errand from the housetops. It was not a business that pertained, directly, either to the Sea Gull or to the coming cruise.

He made an uncommonly careful toilet, discarding two neckties before the operation was finished. When all was done the cravat presented a stuffed and warped appearance which was not at all satisfying, even to Aleck's uncritical eye; but the tie was the last of his supply and was, perhaps, slightly better than none at all.

Dinner at the club was usually a dull affair, and to Mr. Van Camp, on this Monday night, it seemed more stupid than ever. The club had been organized in the spirit of the English clubs, with the unwritten by-law of absolute and inviolable privacy for the individual. No wild or woolly manners ever entered those decorous precincts. No slapping on the shoulder, no hail-fellow greetings, no chance dinner companionship ever dispelled the awful penumbra of privacy that surrounded even the humblest member. A man's eating and drinking, his coming or going, his living or dying, were matters only for club statistics, not for personal inquiry or notice.

The result of this habitual attitude on the part of the members of the club and its servants was an atmosphere in which a cataleptic fit would scarcely warrant unofficial interference; much less would merely mawkish or absent-minded behavior attract attention. That was the function of the club—to provide sanctuary for personal whims and idiosyncrasies; of course, always within the boundaries of the code.

On the evening in question Mr. Van Camp did not actually become silly, but his manner lacked the poise and seriousness which sophisticated men are wont to bring to the important event of the day. He was as near being nervous as a Scotch-American Van Camp could be; and at the same time an unwonted flow of life and warmth in his cool veins. He went so far as to make a remark to the waiter which he meant for an affable joke, and then wanted to kick the fellow for taking it so solemnly.

"You mind yourself, George, or they'll make you abbot of this monastery yet!" said Aleck, as George helped him on with his evening coat.

"Yes, sir, thank you, sir," said George.

He left word at the office that in case any one called he was to be informed that Mr. Van Camp would return to the club for the night; then, in his silk hat and generally shining togs, he set forth to make a call. He was no stranger to New York, and usually he took his cities as they came, with a matter-of-fact nonchalance. He would be as much at home on his second day in London as he had ever been in Lynn; or he would go from a friend's week-end house-party, where the habits of a Sybarite were forced on him, to a camp in the woods and pilot-bread fare, with an equal smoothness of temper and enjoyment. Since luxury made no impression on him, and hardship never blunted his own ideals of politeness or pleasure, no one ever knew which life he preferred.

Choosing to walk fifteen or twenty squares to the Archangel apartment house, his destination, Van Camp looked about him, on this night of his arrival, with slightly quickened perceptions. He cast a mildly appreciative eye toward the picture disclosed here and there by the glancing lights, the chiaroscuro of the intersecting streets, the constantly changing vistas. For an unimpressionable man, he was rather wrought upon. Nevertheless, he entered the charming apartment whither he was bound with the detached and composed manner which society regards as becoming. A maid with a foreign accent greeted him. Yes, Mademoiselle Reynier was at home; Mr. Van Camp would find her in the drawing-room.

The stiff and unrelaxed manner with which Mr. Van Camp bowed to Miss Reynier a moment later was not at all indicative of the fairly respectable fever within his Scotch breast. Miss Reynier herself was pretty enough to cause quickened pulses. She was of noble height, evidently a woman of the world. She gave Mr. Van Camp her hand in a greeting mingled of European daintiness and American frankness. Her vitality and abounding interest in life were manifest.

"Ah, but you are very late. This is how you become smart all at once in your New York atmosphere! But pray be seated; and here are cigarettes, if you will. No? Very well; but tell me; has that amorphous gill-slit—or, no, the branchial lamella—has it behaved itself and proved to be the avenue which shall lead you to fame?"

Mr. Van Camp stood silent through this flippant badinage, and calmly waited until Miss Reynier had settled herself. Then he thoughtfully turned the chair offered him so as to command a slightly better view of the corner where she sat, leaning against the old-rose cushions. Finally, taking his own time, he touched off her greeting with his precise drawl.

"I'm not smart, as you call it, even in New York, though I try to be." His eyes twinkled and his teeth gleamed in his wide smile. "If I were smart, I'd pass by your error in scientific nomenclature, but really I ought not to do it. If one can not be exact—"

"That's just what I say. If one can not be exact, why talk at all?" Miss Reynier caught it up with high glee. She had a foreign accent, and an occasional twist of words which proved her to be neither American nor Englishwoman. "That's my principle," she insisted. "Leave other people in undisturbed possession of their hobbies, especially in conversation, and don't say anything if you can't say what you mean. But then, you won't talk about your hobby; and if I have no one to inform me, how can I be exact? But I'm the meekest person alive; I'm so ready to learn."

Mr. Van Camp surveyed first the bantering, alluring eyes, then turned his gaze upon the sofa luxuries about them.

"Are you ready to turn this bijou dream into a laboratory smelling of alcohol and fish? Are you willing to spend hours wading in mudbanks after specimens, or scratching in the sand under the broiling sun? Science does not consult comfort."

Miss Reynier's expression of quizzical teasing changed to one of rather thoughtful inquiry, as if she were estimating the man behind the scientist. Van Camp was one of the lean, angular type, like Jim Hambleton. He was also every manly and wholesome, but even in his conventional evening clothes there was something about him that was unconventional—a protesting, untamed element of character that resisted all rules except those prescribed by itself. He puzzled her now, as he had often puzzled her before; but if she made fun of his hobbies, she had no mind to make fun of the man himself. A cheerful, intelligent smile finally ended her contemplating moment.

"Oh, no; no digging in the sand for me. I'll take what science I get in another way—put up in predigested packages or bottled—any way but the fishy way. But please don't give me up. You shed a good deal of light on my mental darkness last winter in Egypt, and maybe I can improve still more." She suddenly turned with friendly, confidential manner toward Aleck, not waiting for replies to her remarks. "It's good to see you again! And I like it here better than in Egypt, don't you? Don't you think this apartment jolly?"

The shaded lamps made a pretty light over Miss Reynier's cream-colored silk flounces, over the delicate lace on her waist, over her glossy dark hair and spirited face. As Aleck contemplated that face, with its eager yet modest and womanly gaze, and the noble outline of her figure, he thought, with an unwonted flowering of imagination, that she was not unlike the Diana of classic days. "A domestic Diana," he added in his mind. "She may love the woods and freedom, but she will always return to the hearth."

Aloud he said: "If you will permit me, Miss Reynier, I would like to inform you at once of the immediate object of my visit here. You must be well aware—" At this point Mr. Van Camp, who, true to his nature, was looking squarely in the face of his companion, of necessity allowed himself to be interrupted by Miss Reynier's lifted hand. She was looking beyond her visitor through the drawing-room door.

"Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Lloyd-Jones," announced the servant.

As Miss Reynier swept forward with outstretched hand to greet the newcomers, Van Camp fixed his eyes on his hostess with a mingled expression of masculine rage and submission. Whether he thought her too cordial toward the other men or too cool toward himself, was not apparent. Presently he, too, was shaking hands with the visitors, who were evidently old friends of the house. Madame Reynier, the aunt of mademoiselle, was summoned, and Van Camp was marooned o na sofa with Lloyd-Jones, who was just in from the West. Aleck found himself listening to an interminable talk about copper veins and silver veins, a new kind of assaying instrument, and the good luck attendant upon the opening of Lloyd-Jones' new mine, the Liza Lu.

Aleck was the essence of courtesy to everything except sham, and was able to indicate a mild interest in Mr. Lloyd-Jones' mining affairs. It was sufficient. Lloyd-Jones turned sidewise on his end of the soft, spread out plump, gesticulating hands, and poured upon him an eloquent torrent of fact, speculation and high-spirited enthusiasm concerning Idaho in general and the future of the Liza Lu in particular. More than that, by and by his cheerful, half-impudent manner threatened to turn poetic.

"It's great, living in the open out there," he went on, by this time including the whole company in his exordium. "You ride or tramp, or dig rock all day; and at night you lie down under the clear stars, thankful for your blanket and your rock-bed and your camp-fire; and more than thankful if there's a bit of running water near by. It's a great life!"

Miss Reynier listened to him with eyes that were alternately puzzled and appreciative. It was a discourse that would have seemed to her much more natural coming from Aleck Van Camp; but then, Mr. Van Camp really did the thing—that sort of thing—and he rarely talked about it. It had probably been Mr. Lloyd-Jones' first essay in the world out of reach of his valet and a club cocktail; and he was consequently impressed with his achievement. It was evident that Miss Reynier and the amateur miner were on friendly terms, though Aleck had not seen or heard of him before. He had hobnobbed with Mr. Chamberlain in London and on more than one scientific jaunt. The slightest flicker of jealous resentment gleamed in Aleck's eyes, but his speech was as slow and precise as ever.

"I was just trying to convince Miss Reynier that outdoor life has its peculiar joys," he said. "I was even now suggesting that she should dig, though not for silver. Does Mr. Lloyd-Jones' lucre seem more alluring than my little wriggly beasts, Miss Reynier?"

If Aleck meant this speech for a trap to force the young woman to indicate a preference, the trick failed, as it deserved to fail.

"I couldn't endure either your mines or your mudpuddles. You are both absurd, and I don't understand how you ever get recruits for your hobbies. But come over and see this new engraving, Mr. Jones; it's an old-fashioned picture of your beloved Rhine."

Aleck, thus liberated from Mr. Lloyd-Jones and his mines, made his way across the room to Madame Reynier. The cunning of old Adam was in his eye, but otherwise he was the picture of deferential innocence.

Madame Reynier loved Aleck, with his inoffensive Americanisms and unfailing kindliness; and with her friends she was frankness itself. With two men in Miss Reynier's hands for entertainment, it seemed to Aleck unlikely that either one could make any alarming progress. Besides, he was glad of a tete-a-tete with the chaperone.

Madame Reynier was a tall, straight woman, elderly, dressed entirely in black, with gaunt, aristocratic features and great directness of speech. She had the fine kind of hauteur which forbids persons of this type ever to speak of money, of disease, of scandal, or of too intimate personalities; in Madame Reynier's case it also restrained her from every sort of exaggerated speech. She spoke English with some difficulty and preferred French.

Van Camp seated himself on a spindle-legged, gilt chair by Madame Reynier's side, and begged to know how they were enduring the New York climate, which had formerly proved intolerable to Madame Reynier. As he seated himself she stretched out saving hands.

"I can endure the climate, thank you; but I can't endure to see your life endangered on that silly chair, my dear Mr. Van Camp. There—thank you." And when he was seated in a solid mahogany, he was rewarded with Madame Reynier's confidential chat. They had returned to their New York apartment in the midst of the summer season, she said, "for professional advice." She and her niece liked the city and never minded the heat. Melanie, her aunt explained, had been enabled to see several old friends, and, for her own part, she liked home at any time of the year better than the most comfortable of hotels.

"This is quite like home," she added, "even though we are really exiles." Aleck ventured to hope that the "professional advince" had not meant serious trouble of any sort.

"A slight indisposition only."

"And are you much better now?" Aleck inquired solicitously.

"Oh, it wasn't I; it was Melanie," Madame smiled. "I became my own physician many years ago, and now I never see a doctor except when we ask one to dine. But youth has no such advantage." Madame fairly beamed with benevolence while explaining one of her pet idiosyncrasies. Before Aleck could make any headway in gleaning information concerning her own and Melanie's movements, as he was shamefully trying to do, Lloyd-Jones had persuaded Miss Reynier to sing.

"Some of those quaint old things, please," he was saying; and Aleck wondered if he never would hang himself with his own rope. But Lloyd-Jones' cheerful voice went on:

"Some of those Hungarian things are jolly and funny, even though you can't understand the words. Makes you want to dance or sing yourself." Aleck groaned, but Melanie began to sing, with Jones hovering around the piano. By the time Melanie had sung everybody's favorites, excluding Aleck's, Mr. Chamberlain rose to depart. He was an Englishman, a serious, heavy gentleman, very loyal to old friends and very slow in making new ones. He made an engagement to dine with Aleck on the following evening, and, as he went out, threw back to the remaining gentlemen an offer of seats in his machine.

"I ought to go," said Jones; "but if Van Camp will stay, I will. That is," he added with belated punctiliousness, "if the ladies will permit?"

"Thank you, Chamberlain, I'm walking," drawled Aleck; then turning to the company with his cheeful grin he stated quite impersonally: "I was thinking of staying long enough to put one question—er, a matter of some little importance—to Miss Reynier. When she gives me the desired information, I shall go."

"Me, too," chirped Mr. Lloyd-Jones. "I came expressly to talk over that plan of building up friendly adjoining estates out in Idaho; sort of private shooting and hunting park, you know. And I haven't had a minute to say a word." Jones suddenly began to feel himself aggrieved. As the door closed after Chamberlain, Melanie motioned them back to their seats.

"It's not so very late," she said easily. "Come back and make yourselves comfortable, and I'll listen to both of you," she said with a demure little devil in her eye. "I haven't seen you for ages, and I don't know when the good moment will come again." She included the two men in a friendly smile, waved a hand toward the waiting chairs, and adjusted a light shawl over the shoulders of Madame Reynier.

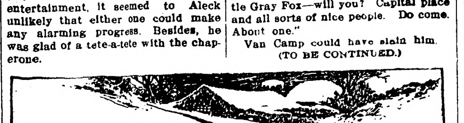
But Aleck by this time had the bit in his teeth and would not be coaxed. His ordinarily cool eye rested wrathfully on the broad shoulders of Mr. Lloyd-Jones, who was lighting a cigarette, and he turned abruptly to Miss Reynier. His voice was as serious as if parliament, at least, had been hanging on his words.

"May I call tomorrow, Miss Reynier, at about twelve?"

"Oh, I say," put in Jones, "all of you come to luncheon with me at the Little Gray Fox—will you? Capital place and all sorts of nice people. Do come. About one."

Van Camp could have slain him.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)



Finger Stall for Child.

Every mother of a small son knows how well nigh impossible it is to keep a bandage on his finger. Also, how frequently little boys' fingers are in need of bandaging. Before throwing away old kid gloves cut off the good fingers for "finger stalls" for the boy. Cut the under side short, but let the top run back to the wrist of the glove; then split this strip to form straps to fasten around the child's wrist with a small safety pin. These stalls will be quite large enough to cover the bandaged finger of a small child and will save endless time and worry, says Mothers' Magazine. For larger children use fingers from a man's glove.

Classification.

"When you come to simmer them down," maintained the finicky boarder, "there are only two classes of people—those who call it 'incommode' and those who call it 'discommode.'"

TURKS CONFERING

BALKAN SITUATION CONFERENCE MAY MEAN FURTHER CONCESSIONS.

WILL DECIDE OUTCOME.

War to Be Resumed if Porte Doesn't Come to Terms—Austria's Aggressions.

London, Jan. 21.—The porte's decision to call a national assembly tomorrow to take under advisement the Balkan situation probably heralds further concessions on the part of Turkey—concessions which could not be yielded by the cabinet without risking its fall. In any case, the Balkan delegates in London do ont believe the porte's reply to the joint note of the powers will be such a flat refusal as was foreshadowed from Constantinople.

Decision Reported.

Saturday's dispatches reported that the Turkish government had reached a decision not to cede Adrianople or the Aegean islands, but was willing to enter into negotiations respecting those islands some distance removed from the Dardanelles. If Turkey's answer is unsatisfactory, the allies in deference to Europe will ask the powers whether they have means to compel Turkey to comply with their wishes. If not, the allies will carry out the plan already announced, leading to the resumption of the war.

In such event, the allies will regard all concessions heretofore made for the sake of peace, either to Turkey or to the powers, as void.

Thus they will not recognize the undertaking consented to an autonomous Albania, or to the promise of Servia and Montenegro to retire from the Adriatic. Questioned as to the possibility in this case of Austria employing force, the head of one of the delegations said yesterday:

Their Attitude.

"We shall see whether the triple entente and especially Russia will permit such action on the part of Austria. If we are forded to fight another war, the cost of which is nearly $1,000,000 daily, we will not abandon territories already occupied unless driven out by force. That would mean a European war.

"If Austria were permitted to march on Belgrade and to bombard our troops on the Adriatic, and we were crushed, we should prefer to become Austrian rather than belong to the Slav race when our mother, Russia, lacks the force or will not protect us."

Greek and Turk Ships Fight.

London.—Although the report came from Constantinople that another engagement between the Greek and Turkish fleets had occurred Sunday, no confirmation of this has been received, and presumably the dispatches refer to the engagement of Saturday.

SULZER FREES BRANDT.

Former Valet Was Given 30 Years for Burglarizing Master.

Albany, N. Y., Jan. 20. Foulke E. Brandt, sentenced to thirty years imprisonment on a charge of burglarizing the apartments of his former employer, Mortimer L. Schiff, the New York financier, has just been pardoned by Governor Sulzer upon Brandt's confession that he lied in his former statements involving the name of Mrs. Schiff and upon Brandt's pledge that he would hereafter lead an upright, industrious life.

United States Senator Knute Nelson of Minnesota immediately announced that he would take Brandt to Washington with him and then take him to Minneapolis, where he would see that he as given employment.

Governor Sulzer, in announcing the pardon, declared he had no sympathy with Brandt and that there was no doubt of his guilt, but that he had reached the conclusion that the sentence was excessive and that the six years Brandt had served was sufficient punishment for his crime.

The terms of the pardon included that Brandt shall never go on the stage, that he will never write a history of the affair, and that the statements he made reflecting on the characters of those in the case will never be discussed by him and that he should accompany Senator Nelson to Minneapolis where he must retain the employment that the senator will procure there for him.

Senator Nelson was present at the hearing in Governor Sulzer's office at which the announcement of the pardon was made.

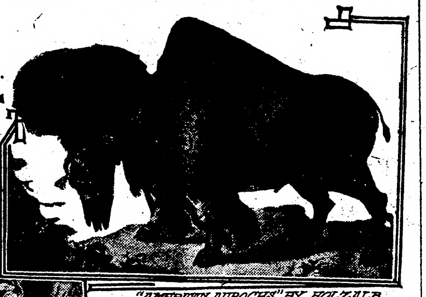
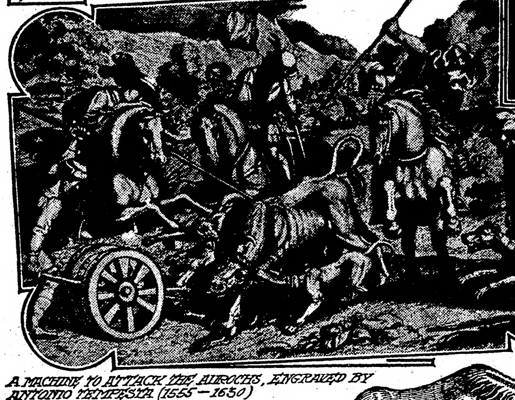
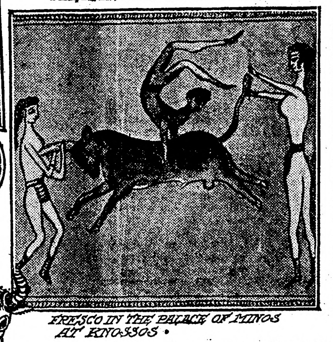
THE AUROCHS AND THE BISON



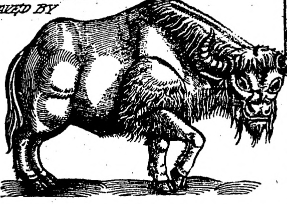
"AMERICAN AUROCHS" BY HOLZALB



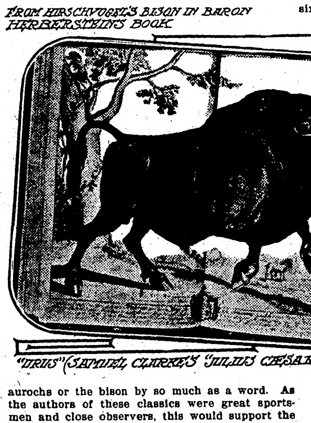
A MACHINE TO ATTACK THE AUROCHS, ENGRAVED BY ANTONIO TEMPESTA (1555—1630)



FRESCO IN THE PALACE OF MINOS AT KNOSSOS



FROM HIRSCHVOGEL'S BISON IN BARON HERBERSTEIN'S BOOK



"URUS" (SAMUEL CLARKE'S "JULIUS CAESAR," 1712

THE differentiation between these two animals is a subject of unusual interest to the sportsman-naturalist. To trace the origin of the popular misconception that the two names are synonymous, a mistake to which even some of our best-known sportsmen of today must plead guilty, we, have to dive into the not always limpid depths of early mediaeval history. For the event which has probably more to do than any other with the promulgation of this error was the famous hunt given by Charlemagne to the ambassadors of Haroun-al-Rashid in the dank Hercylan woods that surrounded his hunting lodge, Heristallum. According to the original account by the monk Eginhard of St. Gall, the aurochs were of such terror-instilling appearance to the men from the east that they could not even bear the sight of them, and fled from the emperor's side. The latter, attacked by the fiercest of these monsters, missed the vital spot, with the result that before brave Isambart could slay it the emperor was slightly wounded in the thigh and had his nether garment torn into shreds. Rushing to his side, the assembled courtiers offered to divert themselves of their own hose, but the emperor laughingly rejected their offers, declaring that he intended to show himself in his sorry plight to the fair Hildegarde, who was a great huntress herself. Needless to say, this adventure proved a mediaeval "scoop" of the gaudiest kind, but in the course of unnumbered retellings the aurochs became a wisent, as was called the European bison, and since that time a perplexing confusion has reigned between these two animals. That the true aurochs, which became extinct three hundred years ago, was an entirely different animal from the bison, whose name, alas! is also on the list of animals about to share the auroch's fate, is now a fact known to all scientific men. To the writer the poor old bison's pathetic fate appeals more particularly, for when shooting in the Rockies in the seventies of last century he still saw them in herds of ten thousand. But as the men who can claim to have seen the same marvellous sight will before long follow these lordly inhabitants of the wilds to the happy hunting grounds, the study of the past history of these two species has for some people unusual attractions. And not the least interesting phase of it is the collecting of pictures made at a time when both beasts were still roaming over the "wastes of the earth," or had but recently disappeared.

Of the earliest of all pictures of what was probably meant to be the bison, an interesting article which recently appeared in an illustrated weekly, in which the roof pictures in the Altamira Cave were reproduced, gave one a capital idea. After a gap of untold centuries we reach the various pictorial records left to us by the chisels, gravers or brushes of the classic ages. Among those who have made important discoveries respecting the distribution of the aurochs, Professor Conrad Keller, the well-known Zurich zoologist, occupies a prominent place. His discoveries in the ruins of the ancient palace of King Minos in Crete of no fewer than sixteen horn-cores and one skull of what unquestionably was the original wild ox of Europe, or aurochs, show that it lived there at one period, and that the famous legend of the minotaur has a substratum of truth. From his pages we borrow an illustration of an important fresco in Knossos depicting an aurochs in the act of impaling a helpless-looking victim, while a bold bull-fighter is actually turning a somersault over the back of the beast, a third, possibly female, looker-on attempting to seize the bull's tail, the scene being probably enacted in an arena. It is possible that the Theseus story came from the slaughter of captives in such exhibitions. Several other pictures have been recently discovered which belong to the Minos period, i. e., between 2000 and 1500 B. C. Professor Keller's highly instructive writings contain many other illustrations of Bos primifenius.

Skipping tens of centuries, we reach the Bestiaries, the most ancient of which originated in the period we touched at the outset when speaking of Charlemagne's aurochs-hunt. These exceedingly primitive pictorial records do not add much to our information; "the choice hurts one," as Germans describe that state of uncertainty in regard to what the monastic artists meant to represent by their crude attempts. Skipping a few more centuries, we at last reach, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, fairly intelligent accounts of the animal's habitat, and are furnished with drawings presenting features sufficiently distinct to indicate, even to eyes accustomed to photographic accuracy, the identity of the animal the picture means to represent.

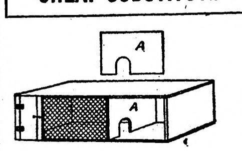
Very curious is the circumstance, to which, by the way, nobody has so far drawn attention, that none of the French sporting books of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, such as "Roy Modus," "Gaston Phoebus," "Gace de la Buigne" and "Fontaines-Guerin," mentions either the aurochs or the bison by so much as a word. As the authors of these classics were great sportsmen and close observers, this would support the theory that both these animals had already then become quite extinct in western Europe.

In the sixteenth century, when Europe, so far as art was concerned, had at last been aroused from its mediaeval stupor by the invention of printing, and an extraordinary demand had sprung up for pictorial matter illustrating recent exploration of new worlds and the various forms of the chase, there were produced quite a number of pictures of the aurochs by artists, very few of whom had ever set eyes upon a live wild specimen, though they may have seen captive ones. The one artist of whom we positively know that he had before him at least a stuffed specimen was the Viennese engraver Augustin Hirschvogel (born in Nurnberg about 1503), who illustrated the famous travel book of Baron Herberstein, the authority most frequently quoted in connection with the aurochs, for he was absolutely the last intelligent observer who saw the beast in its wild state, and left pictorial records of his impressions. Herberstein was gifted with prescient eyes, for he foresaw that the aurochs was doomed to speedy extinction. Hence on his several expeditions to the unknown interior of Russia as the ambassador, first of Emperor Maximilian in 1516-18, then on many different occasions as Charles V.'s and Ferdinand's emissary, he made notes about it, and, what was much more important, actually brought back with him some skins and skulls, which he had mounted in his house in Vienna, and from which Hirschvogel probably drew his celebrated picture of the aurochs. To differentiate he drew next to it a picture of a bison. As these two "portraits," which have been published scores of times, will be familiar to all interested in this matter, we will merely quote the inscriptions placed by Herberstein over the two pictures, for it is a perfectly correct differentiation. The picture of the bison has the following: "I am a Bison, am called by the Poles a Suber, by the Germans a Bisont or Damthier, and by the ignorant an aurochs." Over the woodcut of the aurochs: "I am an Urus which is called by the Poles a Tur, by the Germans an Aurochs and until now by the ignorant a Bison." The inscriptions in the various editions—Herberstein's volume appeared in several languages—vary triflingly, but the above, which are taken from the edition of 1556, give the sense in the best form.

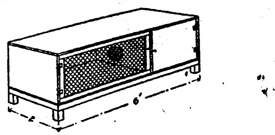
Shortly after Herberstein the Flemish painter Stradanus, who lived and worked for over fifty years in Florence (from 1553 to 1605), produced a drawing of an aurochs engaged in a terrific struggle in an arena where he was matched against a lion, two wolves and a bear. This original drawing is not the least interesting of the twenty odd ancient pictures of the aurochs in the writer's collection. In 1578 the Antwerp publisher Philip Galle published this and one hundred and three other sporting drawings by the Florentine master, and underneath each of the engravings there is a Latin inscription. The one under the plate reproducing the drawing runs: "Some great lords are looking on at a spectacle in the arena. A furious lion with revening fang and claws tears some wild beasts. He lays the wolves low and defeats the 'Taurus' in a struggle, while the bear cowers away in terror." Whether the artist ever witnessd such a struggle in an arena cannot be ascertained; but it is quite possible, considering their great popularity during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The blasts were caught in pitfalls and transported great distances. The likeness is not a bad one, and in the above collection of prints there are three other pictures of aurochs, and a fifth depicting the lassoing of the bubalus on the island of Sardinia. A contemporary and countryman of Stradanus, one Hans Bol, produced also an interesting engraving of an aurochs hunt which forms the second print of his attractive little set entitled, "Venationis, Piscationis, et Aucupii typi," published in 1582 by the same enterprising Antwerp publishers that gave the world the last-named collection. Beneath the aurochs picture we read, in Latin elegiac couplets: "Thus with darts, swords, and light arrows men everywhere drive the horned aurochs into pits." A rather similar print was produced fourteen years after bmy the Nurnberg engraver, Johann Sibmacher, who etched nine other sporting plates. Then follow, in rapid succession, half a dozen "portraits" by Tempesta, the pupil of Stradanus, one of which prints we reproduce. It shows in what awe the gigantic wild bull was held, for it depicts a formidable-looking machine wherewith the bull could be attacked and brought down. Tempesta's pictures need not be taken seriously, for his Roman "studio" was nothing but a workshop where apprentice hands turned out a vast mass of prints of little or no value in an enquiry of this sort. His English contemporary of the pen, Edward Topsell, in his illustrated natural history hodge-podge called the "Historie of Foure-Footed Beastes" (1607) only added to the existing confusion. "A Bison," he says, "is a beast very strange as may appear by his figure prefixed which by many authors is taken for Urus, some for a Bugle or wild oxe, others, for a Rangifer, and many for the beast Tarantus or Buffe." And, to show that he really meant what he said, he affixes a picture of what is unmistakably a reindeer! Fortunately, however, he adds, as pictures of the bison and of the aurochs, replicas of the two prints by Hirschvogel out of Herberstein's "Rerum Moscoviticarum Commentarii," which, as we have already mentioned, are among the most correct representations published at a period when the aurochs still existed.

In England, the belif that th aurochs was a bison-like creature continued throughout the eighteenth century. The picture taken from Samuel Clarke's "Julius Caesar," published in 1712, shows what extraordinary ignorance still prevailed, the animal with antlers like an inverted umbrella being a bison, or Bos germanus, and the beast in the center an aurochs. The graver of Holzab of Zurich, continues the misconception; indeed, goes one better, for the bison is here turned into an "American aurochs." Of numerous other illustrations of our two beasts, we have not the space to speak at length. One of the most characteristic of the latter type is the so-called Hamilton Smith picture of the aurochs. This is a painting, dating, it is believed, from the first quarter of the sixteenth century, discovered in Augsburg not quite a hundred years ago. This painting has mysteriously disappeared, but an accurate copy was made. For the first "modern" picture of the bison that appeared in England we have also to go to German sources, and, strangely enough, to the same city, for it was Augsburg's most famous animal painter, Ridinger (1697-1767), who drew the first life-like picture. A countryman of his, one J. S. Muller, who lived many years in London, engraved, in 1758, a fine set of plates representing wild animals after Ridinger's drawings from nature. Among them is one of the bison, called by him the buffalo, and underneath is a lengthy and fairly correct description in English, which he also copied from Ridinger. But this and other isolated efforts have not entirely prevented the dissemination of the old mistake, for living authorities still tell us, quite seriously, that they have grassed aurochs.

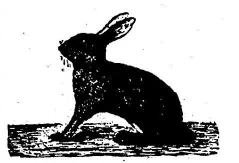
CHEAP SUBSTITUTE FOR ORDINARY MEAT



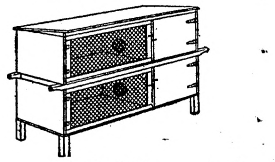
An Outdoor Hutch.



Convenient Rabbit Hutch.



Belgian Hare.

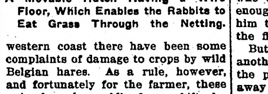


Movable Hutch.

(By DAVID E. LANTZ.)

The fact that rabbits are easily grown and are a cheap and excellent substitute for the ordinary meats is likely to turn the attention of many persons to rearing the animals. That they can be propagated without costly investment in land and buildings is a peculiar advantage. Further, the presence on the farm of another animal which, like poultry, may be killed and prepared for the table entire and at short notice, is exceedingly desirable. All these circumstances make it extremely probable that the business of rearing rabbits will grow in importance.

The Belgian hare is one of the best rabbits for table use. It weighs more than most breeds, develops very rapidly, and the quality of the meat is superior to all the others. The Flemish giant is a Belgian hare bred exclusively for large size, but with the result that the meat is coarser and less delicate in flavor. These characteristics are regarded by some persons as desirable, but this is largely a matter of individual taste. Most people would prefer the white, finer-grained flesh of the original Belgian hare. It should be remarked, however, that much of the excellence of the rabbit as food depends upon its cooking. As often prepared, it is dry and insipid; while in the hands of an experienced cook it becomes all that the most fastidious taste can wish. An especial requirement in cooking the Belgian hare is that none of the natural juices of the meat be lost in the process.



A Movable Hutch Having a Wire Floor, Which Enables the Rabbits to Eat Grass Through the Netting.

The Belgian hare does not do well when kept wild in open warrens. The common English rabbit is better for this purpose. A good many Belgians have been turned out in various parts of the United States, and in the vicinity of the city of New York and on the western coast there have been some complaints of damage to crops by wild Belgian hares. As a rule, however, and fortunately for the farmer, these animals, when obliged to shift for themselves, fall an easy prey to their enemies and disappear within a few months.

Belgian hares may be successfully managed in two ways: (1) Entirely in hutches, or (2) in outdoor fenced runs, or courts, with hutches for does when having young, and sleeping hutches for other stock. The hutch system with various modifications is the more common, and is the only method adopted by rabbit fanciers who raise for show. The use of small runs or rabbit courts to give the animals healthful exercise in fine weather is of advantage.

The rabbitry may occupy part or all of a barn or shed, or be built in a sheltered space in the angle between buildings or walls. The indoor rabbitry has decided advantages. The place should be well ventilated, but not subject to draughts of cold or damp air. These may be prevented by ventilators in the roof, or by a system of elbowed pipes passing through the sides of the building and reaching a height of 2 or 3 feet above the openings.

Hutches for the Belgian hare should be somewhat larger than those intended for smaller breeds. They should be built of good lumber, should have tight floors, and should have at least 12 square feet of floor space and a height of 2 feet. If there is plenty of room in the rabbitry it is best to have the hutches separate; but they are usually set in tiers or stacks, two or three in height. Each hutch in the rank is complete in itself, so that its position may be shifted at any time.

A rabbit court may be paved or floored, or it may be a grass court surrounded by a rabbit-proof fence. Sleeping hutches inside the court may be small boxes of any sort if they are stout and waterproof. They should have sliding doors to confine the rabbits if desired, and should also have small holes near the top for ventilation. If a court is used, hutches will still be needed for breeding does.

A rabbit-proof fence to inclose a grass court should be made of heavy poultry netting 5 or 6 feet wire and of 1½-inch mesh. The posts, projecting 3 or 4 feet above the ground, should be well set outside the edge of the court. The netting is stapled to the posts, leaving a projection of 6 inches or more at the top and about 18 inches at the ground, to be turned into the court. The lower edge should be covered with 10 or 12 inches of soil to prevent the animals from digging out. The upper edge is also turned inward to keep them from climbing over. Brackets at the tops of the posts make the best support for the overhanging netting, although horizontal pieces of wood nailed to the posts will answer.

While not affording large profits, the business of raising rabbits in a small way may be made an interesting as well as a reasonably remunerative adjuncts to other pursuits. It is adapted to small vilalge places, as well as to farms, and under careful management the returns from it are likely to increase as one gains experience. Under favorable circumstances it is capable of expansion into a serious vocation. The presence of rabbits in inclosures on the farm or on village premises furnishes opportunity for an agreeable change in the family diet, a fact that is of considerable importance when ordinary meats are high-priced, or in regions where they are difficult to obtain.

FRESH VEGETABLES MAY BE OBTAINED

Eastern Writer Makes Suggestion That Is Worthy of Some Consideration.

(By R. B. BUCKAM.)

The time was when it was customary to see the small farmer and truck raiser going about the streets from house to house with his produce. The trip to town was an important part of each day's round, which was made as reguplarly as the sun, usually at just such an hour every day. The farmer had his friends and patrons in town, who knew the worth and quality of his produce, and who were wise enough and fortunate enough to make arrangements with him to bring it to them, fresh from the fields, daily.

But nowadays, for one reason or another, this particular activity on the part of the farmer has fallen away wonderfully. In its stead has come, to a large extent, the cry and the push-cart of the "hawker," a species of middleman who must look to this occupation alone for his profits, and who is usually not so much concerned to supply a friend with the best to be had as he is to do a good business, and that is but natural.

One cannot but infer that this change must be more or less to the disadvantage of the customer. He is the loser in the main by this new order of things, though the farmer is probably somewhat in the same position too. Why does he not come to town as he used to? Doubtless more than one cause contributes to this result. He is farming on a larger and more extensive scale than he used to, and has found a ready market for all that he can produce in the modern middleman, who is ready to take off his hands all that he has for sale. He is no longer under the necessity of going in search of purchasers of his wares. The self constituted agent of the public comes to him voluntarily and bargains with him for what he has, and usually pays him a fair price, too.

But a writer in an eastern daily publication makes a suggestion which is well worth considering by any who would welcome an approach to the old order of marketing. It is this: These are the days of the automobile and pleasure riding. Almost everyone, in these times, high or low, manages to get possession of one, by one means or another. But instead of going aimlessly hither and yon, for the pleasure of riding merely, why not have an objective point in view, some farmhouse in the country, and the purchase of a generous supply of fresh vegetables and produce one purpose and object of the outing? Quite a quantity could easily be carried home thus, and the pleasures of the trip extended for several days by the better quality of food and relishes upon the table.

If the farmer will not, or cannot, find time any more to come to the city, then get out the auto and go after him! Strike his trail as the hunters do when they go out with their hounds after the fox, and run him to earth? And when the run is over and the return is made, I, for one, would ten times rather have a bag of fresh vegetables than have a bag of a poor, butchered fox.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

A HOTEL MYSTERY

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

HURRIED meals, taken at impossible hours, are apt to cause dyspepsia. This I found out; and Dr. Thibaut, my medical adviser and friend, fearing I might not obey his injunctions, took the trouble to escort me to a small watering-place in the Dauphine, whence, he assured me, I should emerge perfectly cured.

I did not at all relish the idea of becoming—even for a short time—a fashionable idler. But afterward I had reason to be thankful, for the adventure I met with added a curious chapter to my experiences.

I went to that little place a few weeks after the execution of Eyraud, the murderer of the luckless Gouffe, a most sensational crime, which for several months kept the whole European press at fever heat. And, in order to escape interviewers and kodak-fiends, I decided to travel incognito, entering myself in the hotel books as M. Guilbert; a wise precaution, as I soon discovered.

The most important guests in our hotel where Count M——, a Russian, a fine-looking man of about sixty-five, and his wife, a pretty woman quite forty years his junior. The countess, a restless young creature, was constantly organizing excursions in the mountains, leaving her husband at home to amuse himself.

Two days after my arrival I noticed a newcomer at our table d'hote, Mlle. Eugenie Arco, an attractive young woman with dark eyes and jet-black hair. Her hands were small and aristocratic, and her appearance would have been in every way refined but for her ears. These were too large and stood rather far from her head. The girl fascinated, yet at the same time repelled, me.

It had been raining all the morning, and I was in the reading-room glancing at an illustrated paper, when a voice near said,

"Pardon me, monsieur, I see you are a Russian."

It was Mlle. Arco. "No," I replied, "I am not."

"I thought you were," she continued, "because I saw you reading a Russian periodical."

"I was not reading it," I retorted, "I was only looking at the pictures."

"Oh, I see!" she explaimed. But the look she gave me said she did not believe me.

I did not care to continue the conversation, and she soon left the room.

From that moment, however, I noticed she never ceased to observe me, and many a time when I pretended to be asleep in one of the armchairs in the hall her large black eyes were fastened on me as if they were trying to pierce my thoughts.

With the officials in the hotel Mlle. Arco was a persona grata, for, unlike most women, who in money matters are inclined to be niggardly, she tipped the waiters and chambermaids most liberally. The manager of the hotel and his wife had also taken a great fancy to her, and she was always warmly welcomed by them in their sanctum, where she would sit and smoke cigarette after cigarette.

Feeling myself closely watched by her, I returned the compliment, and noticed that she would repair to the office at those hours when the post came in, and look over the clerk's shoulder at the letters he sorted. And then it struck me that no missive ever came addressed to her, although one afternoon, happening to pass her room at the moment the maid opened her door, I saw her deeply engaged in correspondence, with several letters in front of her.

The next morning, when Mlle. Arco left the hotel I went out at the back, made quickly for the post office by another road, and hid myself behind the hedge of an empty cottage opposite. I saw her enter the post office and leave it a few minutes later. She looked up and down the road, and, nobody being in sight, she took a letter out of her pocket, opened it, and read it eagerly.

"Bah," I said to myself, "you are not clever, my girl. A child could have seen through your game. Now we shall have some fun."

That same evening after dinner rain fell in torrents, and most of the guests were in the drawing-room. A few were indulging in a harmless game of cards; two girls were at the piano singing sentimental songs, and Mlle. Arco reclined in a rocking-chair, a book in her lap. The count, a very reserved man, with whom I had thus far exchanged only a few words, was talking to a retired naval officer who had spent some years in Russia.

"Yes," I heard the count say, "we want a thorough change. It is a disgraceful state of things. These grand dukes——"

"Talking of Russia," I cut in, "allow me to read to you something that just happened in Paris."

I took a paper from my pocket, and as I unfolded it I noticed the count, whom I had interrupted in the middle of his speech, gaze at me with anything but pleasure.

"Last night," I read, "the police were called to a house in the Rue Delambre, in the Montparnasse quarter, where, in a bedroom on the fifth floor, they found the body of a young woman stabbed to the heart. On a piece of paper pinned to her dress the following lines were scribbled in pencil:

"This woman, a wretched spy in the employ of the Russian police, has for a long time past watched young men and girls studying at the Paris universities. Two girls who recently returned to Russia were, on that woman's information, arrested at the frontier, and have not been heard of since. There are, we know, other female spies now carrying on their nefarious work in some of the French watering places, and their turn will soon come.

"The police are investigating the affair, which has created a tremendous sensation among the Russian students here."

There was a moment's silence when I had finished, and then two or three of the guests remarked that it was a terrible business. The count remained silent. He soon after went to bed, and I followed his example.

The next morning after breakfast I sat outside the hotel smoking my cigarette. The guests were at the springs or strolling about, while the countess had gone on one of her usual peregrinations. Toward two the count appeared, and, passing me, gave me one of his formal nods. I went up to him.

"Pardon me," I said; "I owe you an apology for interrupting you somewhat rudely last night; but I took the liberty of stopping you from launching into what looked very much like a diatribe against the Russian authorities. You were apparently not aware that a political spy was sitting within a yard of you."

"A spy!" he gasped.

"Yes, a spy, in the person of that good-looking girl, Mlle. Eugenie Arco. So, now, you will perhaps accept my apology."

"M. Guilbert," he laughed, "I don't know whether to challenge you to fight or to ask you to do me the honor to lunch with me today."

"There is no necessity for either," I replied. "I am only too happy to have rendered you a slight service."

"How did you know she was a spy?" he asked. "Have you any proof?"

"No, only strong suspicion. But we shall now have proofs."

The head waiter was standing at the door.

"I have not seen Mlle. Arco this morning," I called out to him. "I hope she is not ill."

"She has gone away," the man replied. "She left early this morning."

The count looked puzzled. We walked a little way down the road, and then I said;

"I had my doubts about that girl from the start; she is a bungler, a novice in the business. Fancy her suspecting me, a native of Brittany, of being a Russian Nihilist! Political spying is dirty work; but if you do it you must do it well or it becomes dangerous, especially to the spy. And that is why I tried to knock the fear into that young creature by reading out that paragraph last night."

"Yes, about those unfortunate girls. Poor things!"

"Reserve your pity for another occasion, count. I invented that story."

"M. Guilbert!" he cried, "I compliment you on your perspicacity. May I ask what your profession is?"

"I am a commission agent."

"Well," he laughed, "you would have made a fine detective."

"You are very kind. But for everybody's sake it will be well not to mention this affair."

The count nodded assent.

After the spy incident the count became very friendly and talked freely to me on many subjects.

The countess undoubtedly neglected her husband.

Visitors kept pouring in, many of them members of the so-called "smart set." I did not like the appearance of several of the newcomers, and I was glad my cure was drawing to an end. Then a remarkable incident occurred.

The countess had gone on one of her excursions with her male and female followers, the organizer of the party, as usual, being Rene Soudier. Bright, witty, excelling in all sports, Soudier was adored by the women and popular with the men, except with the count. The latter disliked him cordially, and rarely or never spoke to him.

The party had left after luncheon, and was not expected back before 7 o'clock. At three in the afternoon, as I returned from a walk, I saw the count walking up and down in front of the hotel. Something evidently had gone wrong. The moment he saw me he gripped my arm and led me to a secluded spot in the garden.

"M. Guilbert," he began in an excited tone which he tried hard to control; "M. Guilbert, you proved yourself very shrewd when you dealt with that Russian girl. Allow me to apply to you for advice. My wife's pearl necklace has been stolen. Do you mind accompanying me up-stairs?"

The apartments the count occupied in the hotel consisted of a drawing-room, his and his wife's bedroom, and their two dressing-rooms. Marfa, the countess' maid, slept at the end of the passage on the same floor. The count went straight to his wife's dressing-room.

"Look at that!" he exclaimed, pointing to a dressing-bag on the floor, its lock forced open, and many of the things it had contained scattered around.

"The countess," he continueud, "kept her jewelry locked in that. The thief or thieves must have sneaked in after she left. What do you advise me to do?"

"I think you had better wait for the countess' return before taking any steps; she will not be long. In the meantime you might question the maid."

But Marfa had obtained her mistress' permission to go for a donkey-ride to the monastery a few miles distant. So we waited till she came in.

When the count told her of the robbery she looked thunderstruck.

"I swear," she cried, "that when madame went out the bag was safely locked. I did not go into her room after she left."

A loud noise down-stairs announced the cavalcade had returned from their excursion. The countess entered the hotel and her husband went quickly up to her. I strolled down the road leading to the station, when a carriage drove up and a man jumped out, shouting:

"Goron, Goron! How are you, old chap?"

It was Dr. Thibaut.

"Hold your tongue, you stupid!" I said. "What do you mean by bawling out my name? Have you forgotten that I am M. Guilbert? I hope the driver has not heard you."

"That's all right," he rejoined; "he's as deaf as a post. I have taken a week's holiday. I want to spend it with you here, after which we will return to Paris together. What do you say to this arrangement?"

"You have come at a good moment," I remarked; "there is plenty of excitement at the hotel;" and I related to him the story of the robbery.

His eyes sparkled with delight.

"That will be glorious sport to witness," he laughed.

"For you, perhaps, you heartless man, but not for the count and countess."

Having dressed for dinner, we found the guests in the hall eagerly discussing the affair, trying to extract particulars from the waiters and chambermaids. All at once there was a hush, for the door of the manager's room opened, and out came the count and his wife followed by a stout, red-faced, short man with gray whiskers.

"That's M. Julien, the police commissary," some one said behind me.

"I wonder," whispered Thibaut, "how that M. Julien will set to work?"

"So do I. With your permission, however, I shall remain in the background. M. Julien, fortunately, does not know me, but one of his subordinates might; and I do not want to depart from my position of spectator. This is M. Julien's domain. I also see new faces. Look at that close-shaven youth with the flower in his buttonhole. Do you notice anything particular about him?"

"No, I don't."

"Look again."

"I see nothing except that he gives me the impression of being a cad."

"Watch his mouth."

"Well, he seems to want with his teeth to catch something on his upper lip."

"Yes, his moustache. It must have been there quite recently, and he is not yet accustomed to its absence."

"It seems strange."

"This may not be of any importance, but if I were M. Julien I should take note of it."

For two days I heard no news about the robbery, and was wondering how things were progressing, when I was aroused in the morning by a loud knock at my door. To my surprise the count entered.

"Pardon my intruding upon you," he sighed. "I am very much annoyed. This police commissary is not making any headway. He clings to the idea that the maid committed the deed, or that she is an accomplice; and he thinks he is on the right trail. M. Guilbert, I must discover the culprit, and am willing to offer a reward that may tempt any one to help me in my search. The hotel proprietor suggested me writing to M. Goron, asking him to come to our assistance, as these local detectives seem unable to clear up the mystery."

"It is useless to write to M. Goron," I replied. "Remember that this is beyond his sphere of action; and that with the work on his hands in Paris you cannot expect him to attend to crimes committed in the provinces."

"I dare say you are right," groaned the old gentleman, "besides——"

He stopped, and moved uneasily in his chair.

"M. Guilbert," he burst out rather suddenly, "I repeat, I am particularly anxious to lay my hands on the robber. Yet, at the same time, I dread disclosures that might—that might—possibly cause annoyance to the countess. My wife is young, very young, and inexperienced; and only too inclined to give her friendship to people of whom she knows very little. Look at that noisy crowd who follow her on her long rides or drives. Who are they? She made their acquaintance only since we came here. Some of the women of that set are as bad as the men. There is that Soudier always dangling after her. What is he? Who is he? Can one find that out? I have my reasons for asking you this."

"I do not know the man any more than you do, but it will be easy to find out all about him through my Paris friends."

"Please, M. Guilbert, do this for me. I shall be deeply grateful."

"Frankly, do you think of him in connection with the robbery?"

"I suspect that whole fast gang, and feel certain one of them is the thief I hinted at this to M. Julien, but he apparently thinks that well-dressed ladies and gentlemen cannot commit crimes."

The next morning we heard that M. Julien was looking for a man, a waiter, discharged from the hotel for dishonesty, who, on the afternoon of the robbery, had been seen loitering near the house. He had since disappeared; and, as he had been on friendly terms with Marfa, M. Julien would certainly have arrested the girl if the countess had not interposed and vouched for her innocence.

In accordance with my promise to the count I had written to Paris, and the reply I received concerning Soudier was:

"Heavily in debt. Loose morals. Raises money wherever he can."

When I communicated this to the count his eyes lit up with a cruel fire.

"This confirms my suspicions, M. Guilbert. Remember my words—Soudier is the thief."

Thibaut was waiting for me down-stairs.

"Affairs seem at a standstill," he remarked to me.

"Very much so. M. Julien is obstinate. He keeps a close watch on Marfa, and in the meantime he is searching for a poor devil of a waiter. The count is jealous, and would, if he could, at once clap the handcuffs on the fascinating Soudier. The guests eye one another suspiciously, and so do the hotel officials. What a ghastly mess they are making of this business!"

"And the countess? You don't mention her. What does she say?"

"I have not exchanged a word with her on the matter. But from what her husband says, I gather she is convinced that a stranger to the place committed the deed."

"I have a theory," said Thibaut, "that the countess knows the thief, whom she does not want to compromise because——"

"Because she loves him?"

"Yes."

"These things do occur."

"What about the man with the shaven upper lip? I have not seen him within the last few days."

"No; but I have."

Thibaut gazed at me intently for a few moments.

"Goron," he cried eagerly, "you've discovered something. You have a clue. What is it?"

"My dear Thibaut, you have half-guessed the truth. Yes, I scent a mystery, and I wish to clear it up; but not from professional pride. It is from a sense of duty, for, unless I step in, I foresee a disaster."

"Is it as serious as that?"

"It may become so. That is what I want to avoid."

"Can I help you?"

"Yes, by not asking me any questions, even when I absent myself. Understand me well, Thibaut. I must remain M. Guilbert to the end. Nobody, including M. Julien, must know I am Goron. An indiscreet word from you would defeat all my plans."

"You can rely on me."

"I know I can. When, as I hope, I shall have brought my task to a satisfactory ending you shall know all the details of the case. This much I will tell you. The necklace has mysteriously disappeared; I shall try to have it spirited back in the same mysterious way."

A week after the foregoing conversation a cab drove up at the door of the hotel. Thibaut's and my luggage was hoisted on the top; and we shook hands with some of the guests, including the count, who witnessed our departure for Paris.

Half-way to the station we met the countess on her bicycle, some 50 yards ahead of her party.

"Bon voyage, M. Guilbert!" she shouted, her face beaming with joy, and threw a rose into our carriage. I placed it in my buttonhole and gave a sigh of relief.

"I suppose that sigh has something to do with the case," said my observant friend.

We had the compartment to ourselves, and the train was scarcely out of the station when Thibaut called out:

"And now please tell me all that occurred. You, too, must be anxious to unbosom yourself," he added with a mischievous smile.

"Oh, I shall conceal nothing. But, although I did not act in an official capacity, the story is of a delicate nature and I must request you not to divulge it."

"I give you my word."

"It is a strange business, and was even deeper than I conjectured. The first thing that struck me as odd, when the count took me to his wife's dressing-room, was that forced lock of the dressing-bag; I wondered who the lunatic thief could be who lost precious time over that lock, when, with an ordinary penknife, he could have cut the leather in less than a minute.

"You will, however, understand my difficulty, not having had charge of the case, and not having been—like the police commissary—able to investigate closely and question those likely to throw light upon the matter. I had to be guided partly by reasoning, partly by intuition; and the inferences I drew were that the necklace had not been stolen, and that either the count or the countess—possibly both—had reasons for spreading that story of the robbery.

"I assure you I never for an instant suspected Soudier; and the count's hatred of him and his desire to saddle him with the robbery rather told against the former, and gave rise to ugly presumptions. I am, however, as you know, a pretty good reader of character, and I did not believe the count capable of a villany. There remained the countess, with whom during my stay at the hotel I had not exchanged half a dozen words. Do you remember my three days' absence?"

"Yes; I guessed you had gone to Paris."

"You guessed right. I arrived there in the early morning, and two hours later I knew that the countess' father, a broken-down absinthe-drinker, was clerk to a money-changer and money-lender in the Boulevard St. Martin, who was once seriously compromised in a case of stolen bonds. I took a cab, and slowly drove past the place, when I saw our friend with the shaven upper lip emerge from the office, a small traveling-bag in his hand, and jump on a 'bus. His name, I was told at the hotel, is Ballu. I did not hesitate a second. I had seen through the window that the principal's private room at the back was empty, and that in the office were only a young man behind a desk and a girl at a typewriter. I went in and asked for M. S——, the countess' father.

"'He has left us,' said the clerk.

"Returning to the station, I saw Ballu on the platform, and, unseen by him, we both arrived at the hotel at the same time.

"I had already noticed that although Ballu and the countess never exchanged a word when others were present, their eyes often met, and when on the night of my return we sat down at the table d'hote a hardly perceptible sign passed between them. Keeping them both well in sight, I saw Ballu at 9 o'clock stroll toward the end of the garden. He disappeared in the darkness, but I felt sure he had gone to the little summer-house facing the tennis-lawn.

"I soon arrived at the back of the little wooden structure, and felt relieved when I heard some one move inside. Half an hour later there came a light step. It was the countess. Their conversation, carried on in whispers, did not last many minutes. Ballu's voice sounded hard, almost threatening, while that of the countess was imploring. Although I could not catch every word they said, I heard quite enough to be able to reconstruct the whole case. The moment to act had arrived.

"The following morning as the countess crossed the hall I walked up to her and said:

"'Please go to the library. I want to speak to you at once.'

"She gave me a look of surprise and fear, and entered the room.

"'Madame,' I said, 'to you and your alone I will divulge who I am. I am M. Goron, chief of the Paris detective force. My object is to help you. I know your father has appropriated—or is accused of having done so—money belonging to his employer, M. H——. I know you wanted to save him, and, not having the ready cash, you handed to M. H——, through his understudy, M. Ballu, your pearl necklace as security. In order to do this you have—probably at this man's suggestion—made it appear you had been robbed. M. H——, being afraid to dispose of the pearls, is now pressing you to redeem them, and for a larger sum than your father owes him. Am I right?'

"The poor lady sat motionless. Her very lips had turned white.

"'Fear nothing,' I continued; 'I am here to save you. But you must promise to follow my instructions implicitly. Will you?'

"'Yes,' she whispered.

"'Very well. Can you invent a reason that will satisfy your husband why you should go to Paris, returning the following day?'

"She nodded.

"'Then leave tomorrow early by the express, having first wired to M. H—— to make an appointment at his office. Go there straight. Tell him you have seen me—letting him, of course, think I am in Paris—and that you have come to me for advice. Explain that you know from me that his attitude toward you places him in a serious position, from which he can extricate himself in one way only. Having agreed to let you refund him the money due to him by your father—always supposing that story to be true—he must at once return you the necklace, on your promise to pay him a fixed sum on account every month. You can manage that, can you not?'

"'Yes, M. Goron,' she said, putting her hand on mine, 'I will.'

"'Hush! Don't pronounce my name. Should that fellow H—— make any fuss, you can tell him he will soon hear from me.'

"She went, and returned the following evening. I purposely stood at the door as she passed out of the dining-room, when she slipped a note into my hand. Here it is:

"'H—— accepts. Promises to return thing tomorrow by B——. God bless you.'

"Before we left I had the satisfaction of knowing that Ballu had returned the necklace, and that it was once more in her possession."

"When she threw that rose?"

"Yes."

"And the count? How will his wife explain the reappearance of the necklace?"

"She will manage that. Women have inventive brains."

"And the great Julien?"

"Ah! The great Julien will, till the end of his days, believe it was Marfa who stole and returned the pearls; while the count will think the same thing of Soudier. But Julien cannot now arrest innocent people in connection with that case. And it was that, my dear Thibaut, I wanted to avoid."

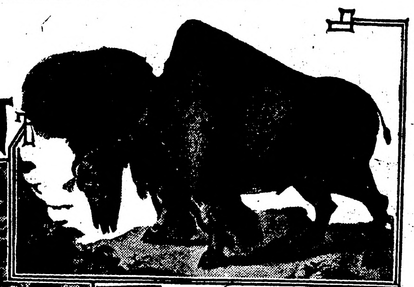
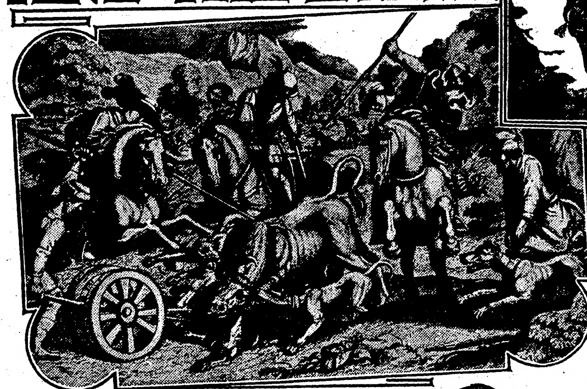
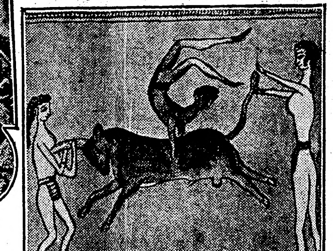
THE AUROCHS AND THE BISON



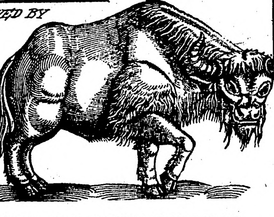
"AMERICAN AUROCHS" BY HOLZALB



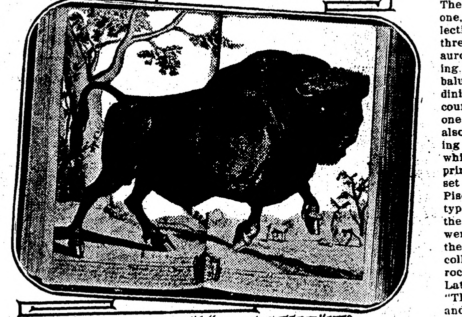
A MACHINE TO ATTACK THE AUROCHS, ENGRAVED BY ANTONIO TEMPESTA (1555—1630)



FRESCO IN THE PALACE OF MINOS AT KNOSSOS



FROM HIRSCHVOGEL'S BISON IN BARON HERBERSTEIN'S BOOK



"URUS" (SAMUEL CLARKE'S "JULIUS CAESAR," 1712

THE differentiation between these two animals is a subject of unusual interest to the sportsman-naturalist. To trace the origin of the popular misconception that the two names are synonymous, a mistake to which even some of our best-known sportsmen of today must plead guilty, we, have to dive into the not always limpid depths of early mediaeval history. For the event which has probably more to do than any other with the promulgation of this error was the famous hunt given by Charlemagne to the ambassadors of Haroun-al-Rashid in the dank Hercylan woods that surrounded his hunting lodge, Heristallum. According to the original account by the monk Eginhard of St. Gall, the aurochs were of such terror-instilling appearance to the men from the east that they could not even bear the sight of them, and fled from the emperor's side. The latter, attacked by the fiercest of these monsters, missed the vital spot, with the result that before brave Isambart could slay it the emperor was slightly wounded in the thigh and had his nether garment torn into shreds. Rushing to his side, the assembled courtiers offered to divert themselves of their own hose, but the emperor laughingly rejected their offers, declaring that he intended to show himself in his sorry plight to the fair Hildegarde, who was a great huntress herself. Needless to say, this adventure proved a mediaeval "scoop" of the gaudiest kind, but in the course of unnumbered retellings the aurochs became a wisent, as was called the European bison, and since that time a perplexing confusion has reigned between these two animals. That the true aurochs, which became extinct three hundred years ago, was an entirely different animal from the bison, whose name, alas! is also on the list of animals about to share the auroch's fate, is now a fact known to all scientific men. To the writer the poor old bison's pathetic fate appeals more particularly, for when shooting in the Rockies in the seventies of last century he still saw them in herds of ten thousand. But as the men who can claim to have seen the same marvellous sight will before long follow these lordly inhabitants of the wilds to the happy hunting grounds, the study of the past history of these two species has for some people unusual attractions. And not the least interesting phase of it is the collecting of pictures made at a time when both beasts were still roaming over the "wastes of the earth," or had but recently disappeared.

Of the earliest of all pictures of what was probably meant to be the bison, an interesting article which recently appeared in an illustrated weekly, in which the roof pictures in the Altamira Cave were reproduced, gave one a capital idea. After a gap of untold centuries we reach the various pictorial records left to us by the chisels, gravers or brushes of the classic ages. Among those who have made important discoveries respecting the distribution of the aurochs, Professor Conrad Keller, the well-known Zurich zoologist, occupies a prominent place. His discoveries in the ruins of the ancient palace of King Minos in Crete of no fewer than sixteen horn-cores and one skull of what unquestionably was the original wild ox of Europe, or aurochs, show that it lived there at one period, and that the famous legend of the minotaur has a substratum of truth. From his pages we borrow an illustration of an important fresco in Knossos depicting an aurochs in the act of impaling a helpless-looking victim, while a bold bull-fighter is actually turning a somersault over the back of the beast, a third, possibly female, looker-on attempting to seize the bull's tail, the scene being probably enacted in an arena. It is possible that the Theseus story came from the slaughter of captives in such exhibitions. Several other pictures have been recently discovered which belong to the Minos period, i. e., between 2000 and 1500 B. C. Professor Keller's highly instructive writings contain many other illustrations of Bos primifenius.

Skipping tens of centuries, we reach the Bestiaries, the most ancient of which originated in the period we touched at the outset when speaking of Charlemagne's aurochs-hunt. These exceedingly primitive pictorial records do not add much to our information; "the choice hurts one," as Germans describe that state of uncertainty in regard to what the monastic artists meant to represent by their crude attempts. Skipping a few more centuries, we at last reach, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, fairly intelligent accounts of the animal's habitat, and are furnished with drawings presenting features sufficiently distinct to indicate, even to eyes accustomed to photographic accuracy, the identity of the animal the picture means to represent.

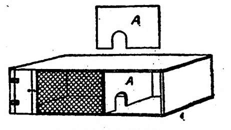
Very curious is the circumstance, to which, by the way, nobody has so far drawn attention, that none of the French sporting books of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, such as "Roy Modus," "Gaston Phoebus," "Gace de la Buigne" and "Fontaines-Guerin," mentions either the aurochs or the bison by so much as a word. As the authors of these classics were great sportsmen and close observers, this would support the theory that both these animals had already then become quite extinct in western Europe.

In the sixteenth century, when Europe, so far as art was concerned, had at last been aroused from its mediaeval stupor by the invention of printing, and an extraordinary demand had sprung up for pictorial matter illustrating recent exploration of new worlds and the various forms of the chase, there were produced quite a number of pictures of the aurochs by artists, very few of whom had ever set eyes upon a live wild specimen, though they may have seen captive ones. The one artist of whom we positively know that he had before him at least a stuffed specimen was the Viennese engraver Augustin Hirschvogel (born in Nurnberg about 1503), who illustrated the famous travel book of Baron Herberstein, the authority most frequently quoted in connection with the aurochs, for he was absolutely the last intelligent observer who saw the beast in its wild state, and left pictorial records of his impressions. Herberstein was gifted with prescient eyes, for he foresaw that the aurochs was doomed to speedy extinction. Hence on his several expeditions to the unknown interior of Russia as the ambassador, first of Emperor Maximilian in 1516-18, then on many different occasions as Charles V.'s and Ferdinand's emissary, he made notes about it, and, what was much more important, actually brought back with him some skins and skulls, which he had mounted in his house in Vienna, and from which Hirschvogel probably drew his celebrated picture of the aurochs. To differentiate he drew next to it a picture of a bison. As these two "portraits," which have been published scores of times, will be familiar to all interested in this matter, we will merely quote the inscriptions placed by Herberstein over the two pictures, for it is a perfectly correct differentiation. The picture of the bison has the following: "I am a Bison, am called by the Poles a Suber, by the Germans a Bisont or Damthier, and by the ignorant an aurochs." Over the woodcut of the aurochs: "I am an Urus which is called by the Poles a Tur, by the Germans an Aurochs and until now by the ignorant a Bison." The inscriptions in the various editions—Herberstein's volume appeared in several languages—vary triflingly, but the above, which are taken from the edition of 1556, give the sense in the best form.

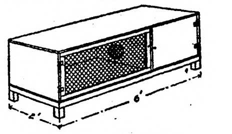
Shortly after Herberstein the Flemish painter Stradanus, who lived and worked for over fifty years in Florence (from 1553 to 1605), produced a drawing of an aurochs engaged in a terrific struggle in an arena where he was matched against a lion, two wolves and a bear. This original drawing is not the least interesting of the twenty odd ancient pictures of the aurochs in the writer's collection. In 1578 the Antwerp publisher Philip Galle published this and one hundred and three other sporting drawings by the Florentine master, and underneath each of the engravings there is a Latin inscription. The one under the plate reproducing the drawing runs: "Some great lords are looking on at a spectacle in the arena. A furious lion with revening fang and claws tears some wild beasts. He lays the wolves low and defeats the 'Taurus' in a struggle, while the bear cowers away in terror." Whether the artist ever witnessd such a struggle in an arena cannot be ascertained; but it is quite possible, considering their great popularity during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The blasts were caught in pitfalls and transported great distances. The likeness is not a bad one, and in the above collection of prints there are three other pictures of aurochs, and a fifth depicting the lassoing of the bubalus on the island of Sardinia. A contemporary and countryman of Stradanus, one Hans Bol, produced also an interesting engraving of an aurochs hunt which forms the second print of his attractive little set entitled, "Venationis, Piscationis, et Aucupii typi," published in 1582 by the same enterprising Antwerp publishers that gave the world the last-named collection. Beneath the aurochs picture we read, in Latin elegiac couplets: "Thus with darts, swords, and light arrows men everywhere drive the horned aurochs into pits." A rather similar print was produced fourteen years after bmy the Nurnberg engraver, Johann Sibmacher, who etched nine other sporting plates. Then follow, in rapid succession, half a dozen "portraits" by Tempesta, the pupil of Stradanus, one of which prints we reproduce. It shows in what awe the gigantic wild bull was held, for it depicts a formidable-looking machine wherewith the bull could be attacked and brought down. Tempesta's pictures need not be taken seriously, for his Roman "studio" was nothing but a workshop where apprentice hands turned out a vast mass of prints of little or no value in an enquiry of this sort. His English contemporary of the pen, Edward Topsell, in his illustrated natural history hodge-podge called the "Historie of Foure-Footed Beastes" (1607) only added to the existing confusion. "A Bison," he says, "is a beast very strange as may appear by his figure prefixed which by many authors is taken for Urus, some for a Bugle or wild oxe, others, for a Rangifer, and many for the beast Tarantus or Buffe." And, to show that he really meant what he said, he affixes a picture of what is unmistakably a reindeer! Fortunately, however, he adds, as pictures of the bison and of the aurochs, replicas of the two prints by Hirschvogel out of Herberstein's "Rerum Moscoviticarum Commentarii," which, as we have already mentioned, are among the most correct representations published at a period when the aurochs still existed.

In England, the belif that th aurochs was a bison-like creature continued throughout the eighteenth century. The picture taken from Samuel Clarke's "Julius Caesar," published in 1712, shows what extraordinary ignorance still prevailed, the animal with antlers like an inverted umbrella being a bison, or Bos germanus, and the beast in the center an aurochs. The graver of Holzab of Zurich, continues the misconception; indeed, goes one better, for the bison is here turned into an "American aurochs." Of numerous other illustrations of our two beasts, we have not the space to speak at length. One of the most characteristic of the latter type is the so-called Hamilton Smith picture of the aurochs. This is a painting, dating, it is believed, from the first quarter of the sixteenth century, discovered in Augsburg not quite a hundred years ago. This painting has mysteriously disappeared, but an accurate copy was made. For the first "modern" picture of the bison that appeared in England we have also to go to German sources, and, strangely enough, to the same city, for it was Augsburg's most famous animal painter, Ridinger (1697-1767), who drew the first life-like picture. A countryman of his, one J. S. Muller, who lived many years in London, engraved, in 1758, a fine set of plates representing wild animals after Ridinger's drawings from nature. Among them is one of the bison, called by him the buffalo, and underneath is a lengthy and fairly correct description in English, which he also copied from Ridinger. But this and other isolated efforts have not entirely prevented the dissemination of the old mistake, for living authorities still tell us, quite seriously, that they have grassed aurochs.

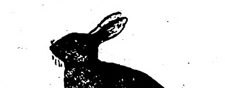
CHEAP SUBSTITUTE FOR ORDINARY MEAT



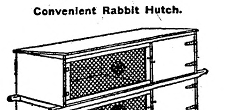
An Outdoor Hutch.



Convenient Rabbit Hutch.



Belgian Hare.



Movable Hutch.

(By DAVID E. LANTZ.)

The fact that rabbits are easily grown and are a cheap and excellent substitute for the ordinary meats is likely to turn the attention of many persons to rearing the animals. That they can be propagated without costly investment in land and buildings is a peculiar advantage. Further, the presence on the farm of another animal which, like poultry, may be killed and prepared for the table entire and at short notice, is exceedingly desirable. All these circumstances make it extremely probable that the business of rearing rabbits will grow in importance.

The Belgian hare is one of the best rabbits for table use. It weighs more than most breeds, develops very rapidly, and the quality of the meat is superior to all the others. The Flemish giant is a Belgian hare bred exclusively for large size, but with the result that the meat is coarser and less delicate in flavor. These characteristics are regarded by some persons as desirable, but this is largely a matter of individual taste. Most people would prefer the white, finer-grained flesh of the original Belgian hare. It should be remarked, however, that much of the excellence of the rabbit as food depends upon its cooking. As often prepared, it is dry and insipid; while in the hands of an experienced cook it becomes all that the most fastidious taste can wish. An especial requirement in cooking the Belgian hare is that none of the natural juices of the meat be lost in the process.

The Belgian hare does not do well when kept wild in open warrens. The common English rabbit is better for this purpose. A good many Belgians have been turned out in various parts of the United States, and in the vicinity of the city of New York and on the western coast there have been some complaints of damage to crops by wild Belgian hares. As a rule, however, and fortunately for the farmer, these animals, when obliged to shift for themselves, fall an easy prey to their enemies and disappear within a few months.

A Movable Hutch Having a Wire Floor, Which Enables the Rabbits to Eat Grass Through the Netting.

Belgian hares may be successfully managed in two ways: (1) Entirely in hutches, or (2) in outdoor fenced runs, or courts, with hutches for does when having young, and sleeping hutches for other stock. The hutch system with various modifications is the more common, and is the only method adopted by rabbit fanciers who raise for show. The use of small runs or rabbit courts to give the animals healthful exercise in fine weather is of advantage.

The rabbitry may occupy part or all of a barn or shed, or be built in a sheltered space in the angle between buildings or walls. The indoor rabbitry has decided advantages. The place should be well ventilated, but not subject to draughts of cold or damp air. These may be prevented by ventilators in the roof, or by a system of elbowed pipes passing through the sides of the building and reaching a height of 2 or 3 feet above the openings.

Hutches for the Belgian hare should be somewhat larger than those intended for smaller breeds. They should be built of good lumber, should have tight floors, and should have at least 12 square feet of floor space and a height of 2 feet. If there is plenty of room in the rabbitry it is best to have the hutches separate; but they are usually set in tiers or stacks, two or three in height. Each hutch in the rank is complete in itself, so that its position may be shifted at any time.

A rabbit court may be paved or floored, or it may be a grass court surrounded by a rabbit-proof fence. Sleeping hutches inside the court may be small boxes of any sort if they are stout and waterproof. They should have sliding doors to confine the rabbits if desired, and should also have small holes near the top for ventilation. If a court is used, hutches will still be needed for breeding does.

A rabbit-proof fence to inclose a grass court should be made of heavy poultry netting 5 or 6 feet wire and of 1½-inch mesh. The posts, projecting 3 or 4 feet above the ground, should be well set outside the edge of the court. The netting is stapled to the posts, leaving a projection of 6 inches or more at the top and about 18 inches at the ground, to be turned into the court. The lower edge should be covered with 10 or 12 inches of soil to prevent the animals from digging out. The upper edge is also turned inward to keep them from climbing over. Brackets at the tops of the posts make the best support for the overhanging netting, although horizontal pieces of wood nailed to the posts will answer.

While not affording large profits, the business of raising rabbits in a small way may be made an interesting as well as a reasonably remunerative adjuncts to other pursuits. It is adapted to small vilalge places, as well as to farms, and under careful management the returns from it are likely to increase as one gains experience. Under favorable circumstances it is capable of expansion into a serious vocation. The presence of rabbits in inclosures on the farm or on village premises furnishes opportunity for an agreeable change in the family diet, a fact that is of considerable importance when ordinary meats are high-priced, or in regions where they are difficult to obtain.

FRESH VEGETABLES MAY BE OBTAINED

Eastern Writer Makes Suggestion That Is Worthy of Some Consideration.

(By R. B. BUCKAM.)

The time was when it was customary to see the small farmer and truck raiser going about the streets from house to house with his produce. The trip to town was an important part of each day's round, which was made as reguplarly as the sun, usually at just such an hour every day. The farmer had his friends and patrons in town, who knew the worth and quality of his produce, and who were wise enough and fortunate enough to make arrangements with him to bring it to them, fresh from the fields, daily.

But nowadays, for one reason or another, this particular activity on the part of the farmer has fallen away wonderfully. In its stead has come, to a large extent, the cry and the push-cart of the "hawker," a species of middleman who must look to this occupation alone for his profits, and who is usually not so much concerned to supply a friend with the best to be had as he is to do a good business, and that is but natural.

One cannot but infer that this change must be more or less to the disadvantage of the customer. He is the loser in the main by this new order of things, though the farmer is probably somewhat in the same position too. Why does he not come to town as he used to? Doubtless more than one cause contributes to this result. He is farming on a larger and more extensive scale than he used to, and has found a ready market for all that he can produce in the modern middleman, who is ready to take off his hands all that he has for sale. He is no longer under the necessity of going in search of purchasers of his wares. The self constituted agent of the public comes to him voluntarily and bargains with him for what he has, and usually pays him a fair price, too.

But a writer in an eastern daily publication makes a suggestion which is well worth considering by any who would welcome an approach to the old order of marketing. It is this: These are the days of the automobile and pleasure riding. Almost everyone, in these times, high or low, manages to get possession of one, by one means or another. But instead of going aimlessly hither and yon, for the pleasure of riding merely, why not have an objective point in view, some farmhouse in the country, and the purchase of a generous supply of fresh vegetables and produce one purpose and object of the outing? Quite a quantity could easily be carried home thus, and the pleasures of the trip extended for several days by the better quality of food and relishes upon the table.

If the farmer will not, or cannot, find time any more to come to the city, then get out the auto and go after him! Strike his trail as the hunters do when they go out with their hounds after the fox, and run him to earth? And when the run is over and the return is made, I, for one, would ten times rather have a bag of fresh vegetables than have a bag of a poor, butchered fox.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

A HOTEL MYSTERY

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

HURRIED meals, taken at impossible hours, are apt to cause dyspepsia. This I found out; and Dr. Thibaut, my medical adviser and friend, fearing I might not obey his injunctions, took the trouble to escort me to a small watering-place in the Dauphine, whence, he assured me, I should emerge perfectly cured.

I did not at all relish the idea of becoming—even for a short time—a fashionable idler. But afterward I had reason to be thankful, for the adventure I met with added a curious chapter to my experiences.

I went to that little place a few weeks after the execution of Eyraud, the murderer of the luckless Gouffe, a most sensational crime, which for several months kept the whole European press at fever heat. And, in order to escape interviewers and kodak-fiends, I decided to travel incognito, entering myself in the hotel books as M. Guilbert; a wise precaution, as I soon discovered.

The most important guests in our hotel where Count M——, a Russian, a fine-looking man of about sixty-five, and his wife, a pretty woman quite forty years his junior. The countess, a restless young creature, was constantly organizing excursions in the mountains, leaving her husband at home to amuse himself.

Two days after my arrival I noticed a newcomer at our table d'hote, Mlle. Eugenie Arco, an attractive young woman with dark eyes and jet-black hair. Her hands were small and aristocratic, and her appearance would have been in every way refined but for her ears. These were too large and stood rather far from her head. The girl fascinated, yet at the same time repelled, me.

It had been raining all the morning, and I was in the reading-room glancing at an illustrated paper, when a voice near said,

"Pardon me, monsieur, I see you are a Russian."

It was Mlle. Arco. "No," I replied, "I am not."

"I thought you were," she continued, "because I saw you reading a Russian periodical."

"I was not reading it," I retorted, "I was only looking at the pictures."

"Oh, I see!" she explaimed. But the look she gave me said she did not believe me.

I did not care to continue the conversation, and she soon left the room.

From that moment, however, I noticed she never ceased to observe me, and many a time when I pretended to be asleep in one of the armchairs in the hall her large black eyes were fastened on me as if they were trying to pierce my thoughts.

With the officials in the hotel Mlle. Arco was a persona grata, for, unlike most women, who in money matters are inclined to be niggardly, she tipped the waiters and chambermaids most liberally. The manager of the hotel and his wife had also taken a great fancy to her, and she was always warmly welcomed by them in their sanctum, where she would sit and smoke cigarette after cigarette.

Feeling myself closely watched by her, I returned the compliment, and noticed that she would repair to the office at those hours when the post came in, and look over the clerk's shoulder at the letters he sorted. And then it struck me that no missive ever came addressed to her, although one afternoon, happening to pass her room at the moment the maid opened her door, I saw her deeply engaged in correspondence, with several letters in front of her.

The next morning, when Mlle. Arco left the hotel I went out at the back, made quickly for the post office by another road, and hid myself behind the hedge of an empty cottage opposite. I saw her enter the post office and leave it a few minutes later. She looked up and down the road, and, nobody being in sight, she took a letter out of her pocket, opened it, and read it eagerly.

"Bah," I said to myself, "you are not clever, my girl. A child could have seen through your game. Now we shall have some fun."

That same evening after dinner rain fell in torrents, and most of the guests were in the drawing-room. A few were indulging in a harmless game of cards; two girls were at the piano singing sentimental songs, and Mlle. Arco reclined in a rocking-chair, a book in her lap. The count, a very reserved man, with whom I had thus far exchanged only a few words, was talking to a retired naval officer who had spent some years in Russia.

"Yes," I heard the count say, "we want a thorough change. It is a disgraceful state of things. These grand dukes——"

"Talking of Russia," I cut in, "allow me to read to you something that just happened in Paris."

I took a paper from my pocket, and as I unfolded it I noticed the count, whom I had interrupted in the middle of his speech, gaze at me with anything but pleasure.

"Last night," I read, "the police were called to a house in the Rue Delambre, in the Montparnasse quarter, where, in a bedroom on the fifth floor, they found the body of a young woman stabbed to the heart. On a piece of paper pinned to her dress the following lines were scribbled in pencil:

> "This woman, a wretched spy in the employ of the Russian police, has for a long time past watched young men and girls studying at the Paris universities. Two girls who recently returned to Russia were, on that woman's information, arrested at the frontier, and have not been heard of since. There are, we know, other female spies now carrying on their nefarious work in some of the French watering places, and their turn will soon come.
>
> "The police are investigating the affair, which has created a tremendous sensation among the Russian students here."

There was a moment's silence when I had finished, and then two or three of the guests remarked that it was a terrible business. The count remained silent. He soon after went to bed, and I followed his example.

The next morning after breakfast I sat outside the hotel smoking my cigarette. The guests were at the springs or strolling about, while the countess had gone on one of her usual peregrinations. Toward two the count appeared, and, passing me, gave me one of his formal nods. I went up to him.

"Pardon me," I said; "I owe you an apology for interrupting you somewhat rudely last night; but I took the liberty of stopping you from launching into what looked very much like a diatribe against the Russian authorities. You were apparently not aware that a political spy was sitting within a yard of you."

"A spy!" he gasped.

"Yes, a spy, in the person of that good-looking girl, Mlle. Eugenie Arco. So, now, you will perhaps accept my apology."

"M. Guilbert," he laughed, "I don't know whether to challenge you to fight or to ask you to do me the honor to lunch with me today."

"There is no necessity for either," I replied. "I am only too happy to have rendered you a slight service."

"How did you know she was a spy?" he asked. "Have you any proof?"

"No, only strong suspicion. But we shall now have proofs."

The head waiter was standing at the door.

"I have not seen Mlle. Arco this morning," I called out to him. "I hope she is not ill."

"She has gone away," the man replied. "She left early this morning."

The count looked puzzled. We walked a little way down the road, and then I said:

"I had my doubts about that girl from the start; she is a bungler, a novice in the business. Fancy her suspecting me, a native of Brittany, of being a Russian Nihilist! Political spying is dirty work; but if you do it you must do it well or it becomes dangerous, especially to the spy. And that is why I tried to knock the fear into that young creature by reading out that paragraph last night."

"Yes, about those unfortunate girls. Poor things!"

"Reserve your pity for another occasion, count. I invented that story."

"M. Guilbert!" he cried, "I compliment you on your perspicacity. May I ask what your profession is?"

"I am a commission agent."

"Well," he laughed, "you would have made a fine detective."

"You are very kind. But for everybody's sake it will be well not to mention this affair."

The count nodded assent.

After the spy incident the count became very friendly and talked freely to me on many subjects.

The countess undoubtedly neglected her husband.

Visitors kept pouring in, many of them members of the so-called "smart set." I did not like the appearance of several of the newcomers, and I was glad my cure was drawing to an end. Then a remarkable incident occurred.

The countess had gone on one of her excursions with her male and female followers, the organizer of the party, as usual, being Rene Soudier. Bright, witty, excelling in all sports, Soudier was adored by the women and popular with the men, except with the count. The latter disliked him cordially, and rarely or never spoke to him.

The party had left after luncheon, and was not expected back before 7 o'clock. At three in the afternoon, as I returned from a walk, I saw the count walking up and down in front of the hotel. Something evidently had gone wrong. The moment he saw me he gripped my arm and led me to a secluded spot in the garden.

"M. Guilbert," he began in an excited tone which he tried hard to control; "M. Guilbert, you proved yourself very shrewd when you dealt with that Russian girl. Allow me to apply to you for advice. My wife's pearl necklace has been stolen. Do you mind accompanying me up-stairs?"

The apartments the count occupied in the hotel consisted of a drawing-room, his and his wife's bedroom, and their two dressing-rooms. Marfa, the countess' maid, slept at the end of the passage on the same floor. The count went straight to his wife's dressing-room.

"Look at that!" he exclaimed, pointing to a dressing-bag on the floor, its lock forced open, and many of the things it had contained scattered around.

"The countess," he continueud, "kept her jewelry locked in that. The thief or thieves must have sneaked in after she left. What do you advise me to do?"

"I think you had better wait for the countess' return before taking any steps; she will not be long. In the meantime you might question the maid."

But Marfa had obtained her mistress' permission to go for a donkey-ride to the monastery a few miles distant. So we waited till she came in.

When the count told her of the robbery she looked thunderstruck.

"I swear," she cried, "that when madame went out the bag was safely locked. I did not go into her room after she left."

A loud noise down-stairs announced the cavalcade had returned from their excursion. The countess entered the hotel and her husband went quickly up to her. I strolled down the road leading to the station, when a carriage drove up and a man jumped out, shouting:

"Goron, Goron! How are you, old chap?"

It was Dr. Thibaut.

"Hold your tongue, you stupid!" I said. "What do you mean by bawling out my name? Have you forgotten that I am M. Guilbert? I hope the driver has not heard you."

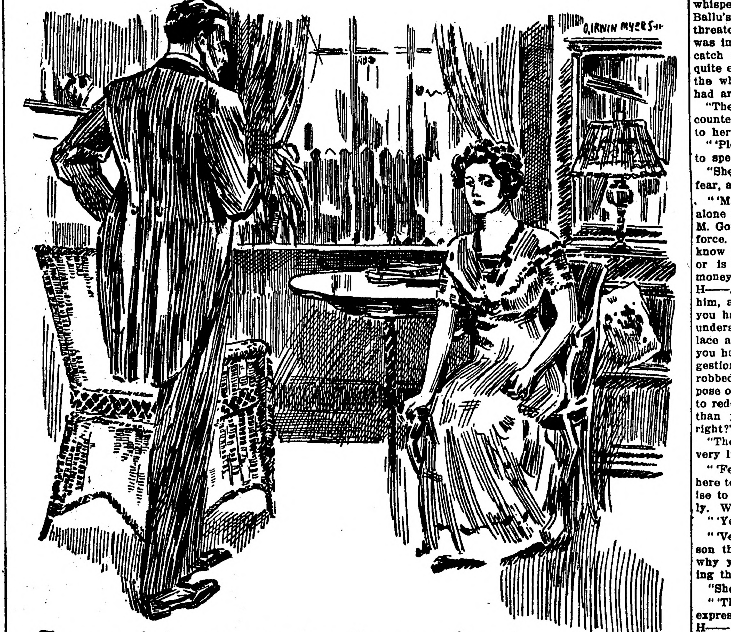
"That's all right," he rejoined; "he's as deaf as a post. I have taken a week's holiday. I want to spend it with you here, after which we will return to Paris together. What do you say to this arrangement?"

"You have come at a good moment," I remarked; "there is plenty of excitement at the hotel;" and I related to him the story of the robbery.

His eyes sparkled with delight.

"That will be glorious sport to witness," he laughed.

"For you, perhaps, you heartless man, but not for the count and countess."



The poor lady sat motionless Her very lips turned white.

Having dressed for dinner, we found the guests in the hall eagerly discussing the affair, trying to extract particulars from the waiters and chambermaids. All at once there was a hush, for the door of the manager's room opened, and out came the count and his wife followed by a stout, red-faced, short man with gray whiskers.

"That's M. Julien, the police commissary," some one said behind me.

"I wonder," whispered Thibaut, "how that M. Julien will set to work?"

"So do I. With your permission, however, I shall remain in the background. M. Julien, fortunately, does not know me, but one of his subordinates might; and I do not want to depart from my position of spectator. This is M. Julien's domain. I also see new faces. Look at that close-shaven youth with the flower in his buttonhole. Do you notice anything particular about him?"

"No, I don't."

"Look again."

"I see nothing except that he gives me the impression of being a cad."

"Watch his mouth."

"Well, he seems to want with his teeth to catch something on his upper lip."

"Yes, his moustache. It must have been there quite recently, and he is not yet accustomed to its absence."

"It seems strange."

"This may not be of any importance, but if I were M. Julien I should take note of it."

For two days I heard no news about the robbery, and was wondering how things were progressing, when I was aroused in the morning by a loud knock at my door. To my surprise the count entered.

"Pardon my intruding upon you," he sighed. "I am very much annoyed. This police commissary is not making any headway. He clings to the idea that the maid committed the deed, or that she is an accomplice; and he thinks he is on the right trail. M. Guilbert, I must discover the culprit, and am willing to offer a reward that may tempt any one to help me in my search. The hotel proprietor suggested me writing to M. Goron, asking him to come to our assistance, as these local detectives seem unable to clear up the mystery."

"It is useless to write to M. Goron," I replied. "Remember that this is beyond his sphere of action; and that with the work on his hands in Paris you cannot expect him to attend to crimes committed in the provinces."

"I dare say you are right," groaned the old gentleman, "besides——"

He stopped, and moved uneasily in his chair.

"M. Guilbert," he burst out rather suddenly, "I repeat, I am particularly anxious to lay my hands on the robber. Yet, at the same time, I dread disclosures that might—that might—possibly cause annoyance to the countess. My wife is young, very young, and inexperienced; and only too inclined to give her friendship to people of whom she knows very little. Look at that noisy crowd who follow her on her long rides or drives. Who are they? She made their acquaintance only since we came here. Some of the women of that set are as bad as the men. There is that Soudier always dangling after her. What is he? Who is he? Can one find that out? I have my reasons for asking you this."

"I do not know the man any more than you do, but it will be easy to find out all about him through my Paris friends."

"Please, M. Guilbert, do this for me. I shall be deeply grateful."

"Frankly, do you think of him in connection with the robbery?"

"I suspect that whole fast gang, and feel certain one of them is the thief I hinted at this to M. Julien, but he apparently thinks that well-dressed ladies and gentlemen cannot commit crimes."

The next morning we heard that M. Julien was looking for a man, a waiter, discharged from the hotel for dishonesty, who, on the afternoon of the robbery, had been seen loitering near the house. He had since disappeared; and, as he had been on friendly terms with Marfa, M. Julien would certainly have arrested the girl if the countess had not interposed and vouched for her innocence.

In accordance with my promise to the count I had written to Paris, and the reply I received concerning Soudier was:

"Heavily in debt. Loose morals. Raises money wherever he can."

When I communicated this to the count his eyes lit up with a cruel fire.

"This confirms my suspicions, M. Guilbert. Remember my words—Soudier is the thief."

Thibaut was waiting for me downstairs.

"Affairs seem at a standstill," he remarked to me.

"Very much so. M. Julien is obstinate. He keeps a close watch on Marfa, and in the meantime he is searching for a poor devil of a waiter. The count is jealous, and would, if he could, at once clap the handcuffs on the fascinating Soudier. The guests eye one another suspiciously, and so do the hotel officials. What a ghastly mess they are making of this business!"

"And the countess? You don't mention her. What does she say?"

"I have not exchanged a word with her on the matter. But from what her husband says, I gather she is convinced that a stranger to the place committed the deed."

"I have a theory," said Thibaut, "that the countess knows the thief, whom she does not want to compromise because——"

"Because she loves him?"

"Yes."

"These things do occur."

"What about the man with the shaven upper lip? I have not seen him within the last few days."

"No; but I have."

Thibaut gazed at me intently for a few moments.

"Goron," he cried eagerly, "you've discovered something. You have a clue. What is it?"

"My dear Thibaut, you have half-guessed the truth. Yes, I scent a mystery, and I wish to clear it up; but not from professional pride. It is from a sense of duty, for, unless I step in, I foresee a disaster."

"Is it as serious as that?"

"It may become so. That is what I want to avoid."

"Can I help you?"

"Yes, by not asking me any questions, even when I absent myself. Understand me well, Thibaut. I must remain M. Guilbert to the end. Nobody, including M. Julien, must know I am Goron. An indiscreet word from you would defeat all my plans."

"You can rely on me."

"I know I can. When, as I hope, I shall have brought my task to a satisfactory ending you shall know all the details of the case. This much I will tell you. The necklace has mysteriously disappeared; I shall try to have it spirited back in the same mysterious way."

A week after the foregoing conversation a cab drove up at the door of the hotel. Thibaut's and my luggage was hoisted on the top; and we shook hands with some of the guests, including the count, who witnessed our departure for Paris.

Half-way to the station we met the countess on her bicycle, some 50 yards ahead of her party.

"Bon voyage, M. Guilbert!" she shouted, her face beaming with joy, and threw a rose into our carriage. I placed it in my buttonhole and gave a sigh of relief.

"I suppose that sigh has something to do with the case," said my observant friend.

We had the compartment to ourselves, and the train was scarcely out of the station when Thibaut called out:

"And now please tell me all that occurred. You, too, must be anxious to unbosom yourself," he added with a mischievous smile.

"Oh, I shall conceal nothing. But, although I did not act in an official capacity, the story is of a delicate nature and I must request you not to divulge it."

"I give you my word."

"It is a strange business, and was even deeper than I conjectured. The first thing that struck me as odd, when the count took me to his wife's dressing-room, was that forced lock of the dressing-bag; I wondered who the lunatic thief could be who lost precious time over that lock, when, with an ordinary penknife, he could have cut the leather in less than a minute.

"You will, however, understand my difficulty not having had charge of the case, and not having been—like the police commissary—able to investigate closely and question those likely to throw light upon the matter. I had to be guided partly by reasoning, partly by intuition; and the inferences I drew were that the necklace had not been stolen, and that either the count or the countess—possibly both—had reasons for spreading that story of the robbery.

"I assure you I never for an instant suspected Soudier; and the count's hatred of him and his desire to saddle him with the robbery rather told against the former, and gave rise to ugly presumptions. I am, however, as you know, a pretty good reader of character, and I did not believe the count capable of a villany. There remained the countess, with whom during my stay at the hotel I had not exchanged half a dozen words. Do you remember my three days' absence?"

"Yes; I guessed you had gone to Paris."

"You guessed right. I arrived there in the early morning, and two hours later I knew that the countess' father, a broken-down absinthe-drinker, was clerk to a money-changer and money-lender in the Boulevard St. Martin, who was once seriously compromised in a case of stolen bonds. I took a cab, and slowly drove past the place, when I saw our friend with the shaven upper lip emerge from the office, a small traveling-bag in his hand, and jump on a 'bus. His name, I was told at the hotel, is Ballu. I did not hesitate a second. I had seen through the window that the principal's private room at the back was empty, and that in the office were only a young man behind a desk and a girl at a typewriter. I went in and asked for M. S——, the countess' father.

"'He has left us,' said the clerk.

"Returning to the station, I saw Ballu on the platform, and, unseen by him, we both arrived at the hotel at the same time.

"I had already noticed that although Ballu and the countess never exchanged a word when others were present, their eyes often met, and when on the night of my return we sat down at the table d'hote a hardly perceptible sign passed between them. Keeping them both well in sight, I saw Ballu at 9 o'clock stroll toward the end of the garden. He disappeared in the darkness, but I felt sure he had gone to the little summer-house facing the tennis-lawn.

"I soon arrived at the back of the little wooden structure, and felt relieved when I heard some one move inside. Half an hour later there came a light step. It was the countess. Their conversation, carried on in whispers, did not last many minutes. Ballu's voice sounded hard, almost threatening, while that of the countess was imploring. Although I could not catch every word they said, I heard quite enough to be able to reconstruct the whole case. The moment to act had arrived.

"The following morning as the countess crossed the hall I walked up to her and said:

"'Please go to the library. I want to speak to you at once.'

"She gave me a look of surprise and fear, and entered the room.

"'Madame,' I said, 'to you and you alone I will divulge who I am. I am M. Goron, chief of the Paris detective force. My object is to help you. I know your father has appropriated—or is accused of having done so—money belonging to his employer, M. H——. I know you wanted to save him, and, not having the ready cash, you handed to M. H——, through his understudy, M. Ballu, your pearl necklace as security. In order to do this you have—probably at this man's suggestion—made it appear you had been robbed. M. H——, being afraid to dispose of the pearls, is now pressing you to redeem them, and for a larger sum than your father owes him. Am I right?'

"The poor lady sat motionless. Her very lips had turned white.

"'Fear nothing,' I continued; 'I am here to save you. But you must promise to follow my instructions implicitly. Will you?'

"'Yes,' she whispered.

"'Very well. Can you invent a reason that will satisfy your husband why you should go to Paris, returning the following day?'

"She nodded.

"'Then leave tomorrow early by the express, having first wired to M. H—— to make an appointment at his office. Go there straight. Tell him you have seen me—letting him, of course, think I am in Paris—and that you have come to me for advice. Explain that you know from me that his attitude toward you places him in a serious position, from which he can extricate himself in one way only. Having agreed to let you refund him the money due to him by your father—always supposing that story to be true—he must at once return you the necklace, on your promise to pay him a fixed sum on account every month. You can manage that, can you not?'

"'Yes, M. Goron,' she said, putting her hand on mine, 'I will.'

"'Hush! Don't pronounce my name. Should that fellow H—— make any fuss, you can tell him he will soon hear from me.'

"She went, and returned the following evening. I purposely stood at the door as she passed out of the dining-room, when she slipped a note into my hand. Here it is:

> "'H—— accepts. Promises to return thing tomorrow by B——. God bless you.'

"Before we left I had the satisfaction of knowing that Ballu had returned the necklace, and that it was once more in her possession."

"When she threw that rose?"

"Yes."

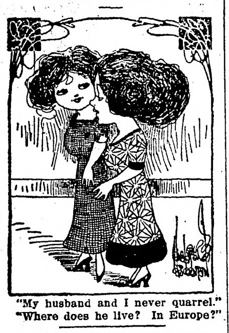
"And the count? How will his wife explain the reappearance of the necklace?"

"She will manage that. Women have inventive brains."

"And the great Julien?"

"Ah! The great Julien will, till the end of his days, believe it was Marfa who stole and returned the pearls; while the count will think the same thing of Soudier. But Julien cannot now arrest innocent people in connection with that case. And it was that, my dear Thibaut, I wanted to avoid."

UNKIND INFERENCE.



"My husband and I never quarrel."
"Where does he live? In Europe?"

ECZEMA CAME ON SCALP

Lebanon, O.—"My eczema started on my thigh with a small pimple. It also came on my scalp. It began to itch and I began to scratch. For eighteen or twenty years I could not tell what I passed through with that awful itching. I would scratch until the blood would soak through my underwear, and I couldn't talk to my friends on the street but I would be digging and punching that spot, until I was very much ashamed. The itching was so intense I could not sleep after once in bed and warm. I certainly suffered torment with that eczema for many years.

"I chased after everything I ever heard of, but all to no avail. I saw the advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and sent for a sample. Imagine my delight when I applied the first dose to that awful itching fire on my leg and scalp, in less than a minute the itching on both places ceased. I got some more Cuticura Soap and Ointment. After the second day I never had another itching spell, and Cuticura Soap and Ointment completely cured me. I was troubled with awful dandruff all over my scalp. The Cuticura Soap has cured that trouble." (Signed) L. R. Fink, Jan. 22, 1912.

"What public board is most in favor in a municipality?"

"I rather think it is the festive board?"

Dr. Hartman Says:

Write to Peruna Testimonials If You Want to Know the Truth.

The following letter was received by Dr. Hartman through his regular correspondence:

"I notice the testimonial of Mrs. Alice Bogle, which you give in your last article. If I should write her do you suppose she would give me further particulars? I have heard it said many times that such testimonials are fakes; that they are either absolutely fictitious or else the people have been hired to write them. I have been inclined to write you a great many times but these stories about patent medicine advertisements have discouraged me from doing so. I am afflicted with catarrh and should like very much to find a remedy such as your article describes."

To the above letter Dr. Hartman made the following reply:

My dear Madam:—I do not wonder that you are confused and have lost all faith in advertised remedies. There has been so much said against them, so much controversy concerning them, I am not surprised that some people have lost confidence in them.

I wish you would write Mrs. Bogle, as one woman to another. I wish you would ask her whether she has been hired to write such a testimonial, whether her testimonial represents the truth.

I hope you will remember that she is a housewife, like yourself, that she has something to do besides write letters, that she is a woman of moderate means and cannot afford to write these letters and pay her own postage. I hope you will enclose stamp so she can answer you without loss to herself. Mrs. Bogle is a very estimable lady and no doubt you will both profit by being acquainted with each other.

Should you conclude to try Peruna for your catarrh I would be very glad to hear of the result. I can assure you that no use will be made of your letter, except by your written consent. Mrs. Bogle very kindly consented to have me use her letter, which is my reason for doing so, and you will be treated exactly as she has been.

People recover from chronic catarrh who take Peruna. There is no doubt about that. Some surprising recoveries are reported almost daily. I have thousands of them in my files. Peruna is for sale at all drug stores.

Minnesota Legislature

Proceedings at the Minnesota State Capitol for the Past Week.

St Paul, Jan. 20.—Early action is to be taken on the Cashman distance tariff bill. Chairman B. E. Sundberg of the senate railroad committee announced that the committee will give a hearing on the bill Tuesday afternoon.

Would Provide Pure Seed.

A pure seed bill was introduced by Senator A. C. Olson of Windom. It requires all agricultural seed except when sold by farmers to dealers for recleaning to state the percentage of germination and the date of the germination test, the percentage of quack grass, Canadian thistle and certain other weed seeds contained as well as the total percentage of weed seeds. The state experiment station at St. Anthony Park is directed to make tests and to prosecute violations of the law.

Dunn Hits Railroad.

Declaring that speedy action by the state is necessary to prevent the Duluth & Iron Range railroad from "committing larceny" in securing valuable iron lands for the unfilled portion of its land grant, H. H. Dunn of Albert Lea, former speaker of the house, secured the advancement to general orders of his bill reserving to the state all mineral rights in lands hereafter selected to fill land grants. The bill forbids the issuing of patents for lands by the state without such a reservation.

St. Paul, Jan. 18.—The flood of bills continues in the house and senate. Merely to name the titles of all of them is out of the question. The more important can only be referred to. Mr. Wallace's public utilities bill, and this is a measure recommended by the governor, provides for a commission of three with an annual salary of $7,000 to each and an annual appropriation of $100,000. This commission would be given general supervision over telephone companies and other public utilities, railroads excepted. The salaries proposed are higher than those drawn by other public officials except governor and chief justice.

County Sanatoria.

Senator Froshaug has withdrawn a bill for tuberculosis sanatoria in congressional districts, previously introduced, and has substituted for it a measure for state aided county sanatoria. In this bill it is provided that the county commissioners may take the initiative.

Senator L. O. Cooke has a bill to compel railroads to sell transportation to all persons at uniform rates. The present system is discriminative. The person who only buys transportation as he needs it is compelled to pay 3 cents a mile, while the person who is willing to buy 2,000 miles at a time gets a 2 cent rate. The Cooke bill would put an end to this practice.

Committee Votes Recorded.

A new rule adopted in the senate provides that the votes in committees on bills and on all material amendments thereto be made a matter of record and that they shall be inserted in the senate journals.

A resolution, previously introduced in the house, providing that an investigation be made into the charge that intoxicating liquors had been dispensed in the secretary of state's office in the capitol building on the occasion of the governor's reception contrary to law, was shelved this morning when it was referred to the committee on public buildings. Previous to its being thus disposed of, its author moved to amend it by investigating also whether on that occasion intoxicants were not available in other parts of the building. No sooner had it been announced that this motion was carried than ex-Speaker Dunn secured recognition to move that the resolution be referred to the committee on public buildings. It was a matter, he said rather for the grand jury of Ramsey county than for the legislature. Moreover there was nothing to investigate. "Every member knows," he said, "that there was liquor here on the occasion in question, and if the secretary of state was called up he would admit it. It is only a little thing," he added, "a little fussy thing, and it would only be a waste of time to bother about it. Let us get to work," he continued, "and do the important work before us and not fritter our time and the people's money away in trivial and needless investigations."

On motion of R. C. Dunn the previous question was ordered, thus shutting off further debate by a viva voce vote. The motion being put was declared carried. So far as the legislature is concerned this is probably an end of the incident.

St. Paul, Jan. 17.—The legislative expense bill was the first to pass the house. It carries an appropriation of $100,000, a reduction of $25,000 from last year. The first bill to pass the senate, and like the other it went through under a suspension of the rules, was one to repeal an act passed at last session making it unlawful to destroy rabbits by the use of ferrets in Hennepin county. It appears that since the passage of the law, rabbits have become so numerous in the vicinity of Lake Minnetonka as to occasion a loss of some $75,000 to orchardists who own property there.

St. Paul, Jan. 16.—After a three days' recess the senate was unable to muster a quorum when it met Monday evening at eight o'clock. The house was more successful, probably half of the members being present. Beyond the introduction of a few bills no busi-

The most important of these was a series of measures introduced by Dr. Stone with a view to lessening the mortality from tuberculosis. The measures provide for the establishment of a tuberculosis sanitorium or hospital at a cost of $500,000; for the creation of a state tuberculosis commission; and for the segregation of persons afflicted with tuberculosis, the theory being that the disease is contagious.

At this session the lieutenant governor announced his committees. These are a few less in number than at the previous session. The assignments are as follows:

Hotel Workers Vote Strike.

New York, Jan. 16.—A strike ballot taken by members of the International Hotel Workers' union resulted in 2,000 day workers voting unanimously in favor of a general strike. It was announced that the order calling out the workers in hotels all over the city could not be issued until the result of the nightworkers' ballot, which began at midnight, became known. If a general strike is ordered, leaders said, the union would be able to call out 12,000 workers.

Start Your Baby With Sound Health

Regular Bowel Movement from Childhood on Forestalls Future Serious Diseases

DIXIE ASKEW DUDLEY

We cannot all start life with the advantages of money, but every child born is entitled to the heritage of good health. Through unfortunate ignorance or carelessness in the feeding of a baby its tiny stomach may become deranged. The disorder spreads to the bowels and before the mother realizes it the two chief organs on which the infant's comfort and health depend are causing it great suffering. If the condition is allowed to continue grave ailments often result.

There is, however, no occasion for alarm, and the sensible thing to do—but it should be done instantly—is to give the baby a small dose of a mild laxative tonic. In the opinion of a great many people, among them such well-known persons as the parents of Dixie Dudley, Magnolia, Ark., the proper remedy is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. Mrs. Earl Dudley writes: "Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is the best medicine I ever used. It cured my baby of flatulency colic when the doctors failed; it cured my husband of constipation. My home shall never be without Syrup Pepsin." It is a pleasant-tasting laxative, which every person likes. It is mild, non-griping, and contains that most excellent of all digestants, pepsin.

This remedy is especially intended for infants, children, women, old people and all others to whom harsh cathartics, salt waters, pills, etc., are distressing. In fact, in the common disorders of life, such as constipation, liver trouble, indigestion, biliousness, headaches, and the various other disorders of the stomach, liver and bowels nothing is more suitable than this mild laxative-tonic. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin.

Two generations of people are using it today, and thousands of families keep it constantly in the house, for every member of the family can use it. It can be obtained of any druggist at fifty cents or one dollar a bottle, the latter being the size bought by families who already know its value. Results are always guaranteed or money will be refunded.

If no member of your family has ever used Syrup Pepsin and you would like to make a personal trial of it before buying it in the regular way of a druggist, send your address—a postal will do—to W. B. Caldwell, 417 Washington St., Monticello, Ill., and a free sample bottle will be mailed you.

"Humph!" I've kicked out many a one. Young fellow, I suppose?"

"No; past middle age."

"Yes, but I have found out since that this man wasn't courting my daughter. He was after my mother-in-law."

A GOOD BREAKFAST.

Some Persons Never Know What It Means.

A good breakfast, a good appetite and good digestion mean everything to the man, woman or child who has anything to do, and wants to get a good start toward doing it.

A Mo. man tells of his wife's "good breakfast" and also supper, made out of Grape-Nuts and cream. He says:

"I should like to tell you how much good Grape-Nuts has done for my wife. After being in poor health for the last 18 years, during part of the time scarcely anything would stay on her stomach long enough to nourish her, finally at the suggestion of a friend she tried Grape-Nuts.

"Now, after about four weeks on this delicious and nutritious food, she has picked up most wonderfully and seems as well as anyone can be.

"Every morning she makes a good breakfast on Grape-Nuts eaten just as it comes from the package with cream or milk added; and then again the same at supper and the change in her is wonderful.

"We can't speak too highly of Grape-Nuts as a food after our remarkable experience." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.—Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Touching the Cardinal.

At the Democratic convention in Baltimore last summer two of the sergeants-at-arms were Ohioans, Col. John Bolan of Toledo and Capt. Joseph Dowling of Dayton. Bolan is the wit who laid down the maxim that "anny man who parts his hair in the middle is no Dimmycrat."

When Cardinal Gibbons had finished the opening prayer, he descended from the rostrum and made his way toward the door. As he neared the exit where the two Ohioans were on guard, Bolan whispered:

"Joe, touch him whin he passes ye."

"All right, colonel," replied Dowling, with an innocent air. "What pocket has he got it in?"—Popular Magazine.

WHERE WE FIND EMERALDS

Famous Muzo Mines in the Republic of Colombia Produce Finest Gems.

The finest emeralds are found in the Republic of Colombia, at the famous Muzo mines in the department of Boyaca, seventy miles north by west of Bogota, which have been worked since 1558. The Spaniards mined there in the middle of the sixteenth century, but withdrew after a time, owing to continual fighting with the Indians; with the result that for awhile the locality of the mines was unknown. They are now worked by an English company, in partnership with the government. The emeralds at Muzo occur in calcite veins running through black carboniferous limestone in all directions and at all angles. Often the limestone is covered with earth, in which bushes and trees are growing; this has to be cleared before prospecting is possible. When calcite veins have been located, the side of the hill is dug away in "banks," usually by Indians, whose chief tool is a steel bar forged to a point at one end. The pieces of calcite vein are examined superficially for emeralds, and are then set aside for conveyance to the sorting-shed, where a detailed examination is made and the emeralds are divided into fifteen grades, according to color, transparency, size, freedom from flaws, and so on.

BIG INDIAN SCANDAL

CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE REPORTS LAND INTERESTS NOT PROTECTED.

CONDITION IS PITIFUL

Declared That Reds Are Being Treated in Shameful Manner—Major McLaughlin Criticised For Conduct.

Washington, Jan. 17.—Charges of gross frauds against the Indians on the White Earth Indian reservation in Minnesota, that their physical and material condition is pitiful, and that Major James McLaughlin, Indian inspector, did not properly guard the Indians' interests in the allotment of lands, were made to the house yesterday in a report by the committee on expenditures in the interior department.

Recommends a Remedy.

It recommended that congress seek some remedy for the "present anomalous situation," by which the commissioner of Indian affairs has complete control over property worth $1,000,000,000 belonging to Indians of the various tribes in the United States.

The report declares that the Chippewa and other Indians were defrauded of large sums in the sale of lands and standing timber on the White Earth reservation. A sale in 1900 the committee "finds from undisputed authority was fraudulent in the details of its accomplishment." The committee further charges that "fraudulent partiality" was shown by Simon Michelet, Indian allotting agent, in allotting the Indian timber under the law of 1905.

All Pre-arranged.

"The best and most valuable pine allotments fell into the hands of those who were intended in advance to receive them," says the report.

Investigations following these acts, the committee says, resulted in the sending out of an Indian agent, Thomas Downs, who "found the proceedings partial, unfair and unjust. Thereupon the paid agents of the lumber companies who claimed rights themselves as Indians and who would be beneficiaries of the allotment fraud remonstrated to the interior department for the setting aside of the proceedings."

McLaughlin Accused.

The report declares that Major James McLaughlin, the second agent sent out, refused to allow the fullblood Indians to send out runners to bring in the people, made false reports as to the number of fullbloods present and gave no adequate notice to the Indians of the mass meeting, at which the question came up, which "in effect was a council of lumber companies."

The action of former Commissioner Francis E. Leupp was condemned on the ground that he prevented a full statement of the Indian complaints to President Roosevelt.

Indians to Seek Money.

Nett Lake.—At a council meeting of the Bois Fort band of Indians here it was decided to send Chiefs Dah-Bway-Wam-Dung and Mahjishkung and Interpreter Frank H. Pequette to Washington Feb. 17 to see President-elect Wilson. The trip is for the purpose of presenting a petition to the president-elect involving money alleged by the Indians to have been withheld. Improvements also will be urged by the red men.

The Indians claim that they never received the benefits of $50,000 that the government claims to have distributed to them in money and clothes in the early agency work in this section. Thirty thousand dollars also was appropriated to put the young Indians on their allotments in that early stage and the Indians claim that not a cent of it ever was turned over. Sixteen thousand dollars also was set apart for tools and the Indians allege that not a tool was purchased—at least they say the tools were not given to them.

Burns Cost Life of Farmer.

Comfrey.—Charles Freeman, farmer, died from burns received in a gasoline explosion. To thaw out his pump he set fire to some cloth, which he had previously soaked in oil and wrapped it around the pump. The fire went out, and, thinking there was no danger, he poured some more gasoline on the cloth. There was an explosion and the burning oil scattered over Freeman's clothing. His wife and hired man heard his cries and managed to get the burning clothes from his body. His wife's hands were badly burned.

Wavertree Ranch Sold.

Jackson.—E. W. Darling of Chicago has bought the Wavertree ranch of 4,000 acres for $350,000. Manager Woodin is to remain. This is one of the largest land deals ever negotiated in southwestern Minnesota. Mr. Darling will engage in stock-raising on a large scale.

Good Templars Celebrate.

Goodhue.—Belle Creek lodge, International Order of Good Templars, celebrated its twentieth anniversary Monday and Tuesday. The exercises began with a public meeting and general reunion, addressed by the grand templar, George H. Hazzard, of St. Paul. Twenty-two new names were subscribed and on Tuesday evening a class of fourteen was initiated. Five of the charter members of this lodge, which was organized by Rev. C. F. Dykeman on January 14, 1893, were in attendance.

MISSISSIPPI TO CANAL.

J. G. Armson of Stillwater Says Electric Power Worth $1,000,000 Annually Could be Developed.

Duluth.—Arguments on the proposed extension of the twenty-foot channel in the St. Louis river which empties into the Duluth-Superior harbor from Big Island to Commonwealth avenue at New Duluth, were heard here by government engineers. Two other proposed projects also received attention, the principal one being the proposed canal to connect Lake Superior and the Mississippi river.

The board of engineers was composed of Col. C. L. Potter of St. Paul, chairman; Lieutenant Colonel F. R. Shunk of Pittsburg, and Captain E. D. Peek of Duluth.

The principal argument for the canal connecting Lake Superior and the Mississippi river was made by J. G. Armson of Stillwater, representing the St. Croix River Improvement Association; the Citizens' Association of Stillwater, the Upper Mississippi River Improvement Association, and the Association of Commerce of St. Paul.

Mr. Armson contended for a channel eight feet deep suitable for floating large canal barges. He read several pages of argument and statistics setting forth that the proposed canal would connect the waters of the nation generally and give a direct water route through the heart of the continent to connect with the Panama canal. He said that annual savings of $4,500,000 in transportation costs would be possible and that electric power worth $1,000,000 annually could be developed.

A request for a harbor of refuge at the mouth of Brule river, Lake Superior, was presented. There was some opposition to the canal by people who don't think the project practical.

Editors to Meet at St. Cloud.

Bemidji.—Two Bemidji newspaper men are slated to speak before the annual business meeting of the Northern Minnesota Editorial Association at St. Cloud, January 24, and 25. F. A. Wilson will speak on "How to Run a Newspaper Without a Job Press," and A. G. Rutledge is also on the program. Other speakers will be C. F. Scheers, Akeley Herald-Tribune; C. M. Atkinson, Hibbing Mesaba Ore; J. C. Morrison, Morris Tribune; Roe Chase, Anoka Herald; C. F. Mehnke, Moose Lake Gazette; C. R. C. Baker, Red Lake Falls Gazette, and M. C. Cutter, Thief River Falls News-Press. A banquet and smoker will follow the program.

Grant County to the Fore.

Elbow Lake.—A two days' farmers' institute was held here last week. The meetings were held in the opera house which seats 300 people, and it was crowded to the doors at every session. The conductors say the attendance here was the best they have had this winter. Grant county is one of the seven counties in the West Central Minnesota Development Association that has a county agricultural agent and farmers are taking a keen interest in the movement for better seed and stock, and intensive methods of farming.

To Fight Customs Change.

Duluth.—Shipmasters of the Great Lakes will vigorously oppose the removal of the Duluth customs office to St. Paul, in accordance with changes which have been suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury. Captain Albert Swenson, nautical expert in charge of the Duluth hydrographic office, who will be delegate to the grand lodge meeting of the shipmasters' association in Washington Tuesday, will lay the matter before the lodge.

Omaha Road Appointments.

St. James.—Several changes are announced on this division of the Omaha road. F. E. Nichols, superintendent here, is promoted to be superintendent at Eau Claire, Wis., to succeed Division Superintendent T. W. Kennedy who becomes assistant to the general manager at St. Paul. J. B. Welsh of Omaha becomes division superintendent here and E. E. Blundell, assistant superintendent at Eau Claire, goes to Omaha as superintendent.

Will Co-Operate in Marketing.

Winona.—The Winona Fruit Growers and Market Gardeners' association has organized for the year. The plan of co-operation between growers proved so successful in 1912 that it is desired to try it again. An agent is named for the association and members market their products through him. H. H. Rutter was elected president of the association for the coming year. The manager will be chosen later.

Slips on Roof; Falls to Death.

Rochester, Minn., Jan. 15.—James Deseres was instantly killed by accidentally slipping while at work on the roof of the E. A. Knowlton residence. He fell 25 feet and landed on his head, fracturing his skull and breaking his collar bone. Deseres was an expert tile layer and was tiling the roof. He resided in St. Louis and has a wife and two children.

Institute Well Attended.

Glencoe.—A farmers' institute has just closed here which had the largest attendance on record in the community for meetings of this kind. W. F. Schilling of Northfield was in charge and was assisted by Arthur Brochett of Excelsior, J. M. Christgau and L. F. Roemer. Special features were the tuberculosis demonstration by Dr. C. C. Lipp of the college of agriculture, a corn contest with sixty entries, and the daily lunches furnished free to farmers by Glencoe business men.

FOUR RATES OFFERED.

Zumbro Power Company and Rochester Come to Agreement— Dam at Falls Assured.

Rochester.—The Zumbro Power company has framed its final proposal to furnish electric current to the city by harnessing the Zumbro river and building a fifty-foot dam at Zumbro Falls. The promoters of the company have held several conferences with a commitee composed of the mayor, the city council, the city attorney, members of the utility board and the superintendent of the electric light plant, and as a result numerous changes have been made in the original offer. The committee will recommend that the offer be accepted, and it seems probable the deal will be consummated.

The biggest change in the proposal of the power company is the reduction of rates. The first offer made the minimum rate for the year $32,000, the current to be supplied at 2¼ cents for the first 1,000,000 kilowatt hours, and 1½ cents for all above that amount. In the final proposition the minimum annual payment is $30,000, and the city is given the option of four rates: 2¼ cents for the first 1,000,000 and 1½ cents per kilowatt hour for all above that amount; 2 cents for the first 1,500,000 and 1½ cents per kilowatt hour for all above that amount; 2 cents for the first 1,500,00 and 1½ cents for all above; 1⅞ cents for the first 2,000,000 and 1½ cents for all above, or a flat rate of 1.8 cents for all current used.

N. D. MAN FREEZES FEET.

I. O. Iverson Plunges Down Embankment—Hands Also Frostbitten In Night's Exposure.

St. Paul.—I. O. Iverson, 40 years old, of Pleasant Lake, N. D., was picked up at the foot of the bluff near the Lafayette avenue bridge at 7:30 Tuesday, suffering from a long scalp wound and with both hands and feet frozen. He had fallen down the bluff some time during the night while intoxicated, according to the police. Iverson is at the City hospital, where his condition is critical.

Iverson was rendered unconscious by the fall. After daylight, Fred Bernard and James McGovern caught sight of the man as they were crossing the bridge. They called the police, and Police Surgeon Ingerson took Iverson to the hospital.

Should he live, it is probable that both hands and feet will have to be amputated.

Indian School to Be Maintained.

Pipestone.—Reports from Washington are that the Pipestone Indian training school will be given its customary allowance by congress. The sum of $47,500 is appropriated by congress for regular running expenses for the year and an additional sum of $1,500 is given to complete the new electric light and sewer systems. The sum of $6,000 had previously been appropriated for electric light and sewer.

Home Burned; Children Saved.

Tower.—Erick Skikkila, a settler on a claim about eight miles south of here, lost his home by fire. He was at a neighbor's and his wife was outdoors doing the chores, leaving the children alone inside. She heard cries and rushing to the house found it in flames. She saved the little ones at the risk of her own life. The outbuildings and all the hay, as well as the home, were destroyed.

Heavyweights in Office.

Marshall.—Lyon county's new sheriff, John Munro, has appointed as his deputy, H. O. Clark, and the weight of these two is 522 pounds. Former Sheriff M. E. Grannan has been appointed chief of police here. Two new commissioners, Ludvig Larson and B. M. Olson, took the oath of office. The Marshall News-Messenger was given the county printing for 1913.

Cloquet.—A farmers' institute is being conducted here. C. O. Carlson of Erskine, L. H. Bugbee of Wrenshall and R. W. Smith of Parkers Prairie are in charge. An institute for the benefit of the Indians was held in the Fond du Lac village north of Cloquet, and was well attended.

Arlington's Institute a Success.

Arlington.—The farmers' institute held here Friday and Saturday was well attended. W. F. Schilling and his associate field workers, presented some interesting subjects to the farmers. The Arlington Commercial club served a free noonday lunch at the club rooms both days.

Wilmont Has Second Bank.

Rushmore.—Wilmont, with 300 inhabitants, has a second bank known as the Farmers' State bank. A faction has been formed in the village between the new organization and the First National, which has done business since the town started some twelve years ago.

N. D. Miss Got Lonesome.

Minneapolis.—"I just couldn't possibly stand it any longer, out there on the homestead, with nothing to see but prairie. No nice houses, no parties to go to, five miles from town, and even when I did get to town there weren't any shows or anything." The pretty North Dakota girl sighed as she looked around the room in the county jail. "That's why I ran away with Roy and came here. "We used to live in Indiana and then, two years ago, my folks took that homestead seven miles from Belfield."

A negro clairvoyant who for some time masqueraded as a Hindoo was recently visited by a collector, Mike O'Conner.

When the bill was produced the palm reader forgot his Hindoo ancestors and a stream of perfect English swear words poured from his lips.

For years the Province of Alberta (Western Canada) was the Big Ranching Country. Something to Be Thankful For.

Michael Mehan was the proud possessor of a brand new silk high hat. At the wake of his dearest enemy he had guarded it carefully, and as a consequence was strolling home with the tile unscathed. As he passed the site of a building operation, a lady acquaintance nodded pleasantly.

With an ostentatious wave of the hat, which exhibited it to excellent advantage, Michael bowed. At the same moment a brick sailed down from an upper floor and bounced from his bared skull. Upon coming to he inquired anxiously for the hat. A bystander restored it unharmed. Mike felt the egg-sized lump on his head occasioned by the impact of the brick, and then regarded his undamaged tile. "Begorry," he sighed in satisfaction, "it's lucky it is I saw the loidy in toime!"

Nice Distinction.

"Pa, what is a patriot?"

"That depends, my son. In the time of George Washington, he was a man who walked barefoot on snow and ice to serve his country. Now he is one who does it by getting a job."

No doubt you'll agree that the growth of the parcel post business is astounding. Sure it is—but have you stopped to think how thoroughly it was advertised?—Duluth Herald.

Roseau Times: The state of Minnesota is in need of a new Constitution and it would be in line with progressive ideas for a progressive legislature to provide for a constitutional convention, but it wont.

Senator Nelson has again been elected by the Minnesota legislature, and, for the first time in the history of the state, by an unanimons vote of all the members. This is the result of the primary election properly ratified.

Warren Register: Leaders of the now defunct Minnesota state senate combine complain that it was newspaper publicity that killed the nice little game they had incubated. It could not have had much merit, or it would have withstood the light of day better. Their complaint is also an unwilling, perhaps unwitting, tribute to the press when enlisted on the side of the right, as it usually is.

A bill has been introduced in the legislature to prohibit baseball games on Sundays. Similar bills have often been introduced before, but have very properly been killed. It would be probably all right enough to prohibit Sunday baseball in any location where the resultant noise might prove a disturbing element to public worship, but we believe it would be detrimental to the physical, mental and moral welfare of a lot of people to prohibit it altogether.

ONE POST SHE WOULDN'T FIT

Woman Speaker's Eulogy of Capability of Her Sex Interrupted by Mere Man.

With tense, eager faces the great audience of women leaned forward in their seats, eagerly drinking in the noted speaker's every word.

"Mere man," she was saying, "is wont to belittle woman's ability to enter the fields already usurped by him. As a matter of fact she is capable of filling any post of public or private office now held by man, and, if appointed to it, could even perform man's tasks with greater faithfulness and greater daring.

"Name, if you can, one post for which she cannot fit herself! Name one office to which she would not, could not, give the greatest measure of capability, the highest degree of courage, the—"

LADIES' AID SOCIETY.

"Help!" Officer Mulcahey wheeled at the cry which reached him over the din of a congested corner, and an ice wagon whose driver had been waiting all morning for this opening, dashed madly across the street. But Officer Mulcahey, oblivious to everything but the call for assistance, darted to the sidewalk and allowed the ice wagon to thunder on its way unmolested.

Standing by the lamp-post, with tears dimming her azure eyes, stood Angelica Gotterdammerung. Again she shrieked:

"Police! Help!"

"What's the matter?" cried Officer Mulcahey, as he reached her side. "Who did it?"

Angelica breathed a sigh of relief. "Oh, officer," she said, "I left my vanity case at home, and my nose is shiny!"—New York Sun.

ODD FACTS ABOUT PEARLS

They Must Have Air and Light to Retain Their Beauty and Brilliancy.

One peculiarity of the pearl is that to retain its beauty and brilliancy it must have air and light. In 18[illegible] an Indianapolis man possessed himself of two small, pear-shaped pearls that were found in mussel shells in the Wabash river near New Harmony. He says that, intending to have them mounted as earrings at some future time, he put them away wrapped in writing paper in a dark corner of a drawer, where the paper was left unopened for ten years. When the paper was opened what was his astonishment to find what had been these beautiful pearls was only a white powder, merely carbonate of lime.

The pearl is the oldest object of personal adornment. The records of the Babylonians, Egyptians, Persians and Romans make mention of the pearl. The wife of the Emperor Caligula at a betrothal feast decorated herself with pearls to the value of $1,650,000. Julius Caesar presented Servilia, the mother of Brutus, of whom it was said he was the lover, with a pearl valued at $250,000. Philip II. of Spain paid $200,000 for the pearl known as Peregrina. This pearl was found in Panama and weighed 134 karats. France owns the largest pearl known. It is 2 inches long, 4½ inches in circumference at one end and 3½ inches at the other. It weighs 1,800 grams and is valued at $60,000.

BILL NYE ON YOUTH.

Youth is the springtime of life. It is the time to acquire information, so that we may show it off in after years and paralyze people with what we know. The wise youth will "lay low" till he gets a whole lot of knowledge, and then in later days turn it loose in an abrupt manner. He will guard against telling what he knows a little at a time. That is unwise. I once knew a youth who wore himself out telling people all he knew from day to day, so that when he became a bald-headed man he was utterly exhausted and didn't have anything left to tell anyone. Some of the things that we know should be saved for our own use. The man who sheds all his knowledge and doesn't leave enough to keep house with fools himself.—Bill Nye.

TARIFF EXPERT.

"What is your object in wanting them to start a revision of the tariff immediately?"

"I don't want to start a revision," replied Senator Sorghum. "What I want to do is to start the kind of an argument that will be its own explanation of indefinite delay."

Mystery Still Unsolved

Whether Carsten Gronwald died from exposure or from the blow of an assailant, is not yet proved.

Our readers will readily recall the stories of his death and the finding of his hidden money in the places described in a letter by John Gunderson, seer, clairvoyant, or whatever he may be, of Saskatchewan. In his letter Gunderson stated that an unnamed man had assaulted and robbed Gronwald, and that he had died from the effects of a blow on the head. The letter gave description of the assailant, and, so we are informed, Gunderson will tell his name if anyone goes to him for it, but will not send it by mail.

There the matter stands. Some who believe absolutely in Gunderson's occult power think the sheriff should follow up the clues given in Gunderson's letter. Others, who claim to know the sheriff, say that it will take something more substantial than a message from the great unknown—something with a hard, metallic jingle, for instance—to get him interested very deeply.

In the meantime, the publication of the story has carried it over the entire country, and Mrs. Gronwald is fairly deluged with letters asking if the story be true, and for Gunderson's address. Some enclose stamps and some do not, and Mrs. Gronwald is unable to keep her correspondence caught up with.

Bricker Got Verdict Against C. H. Gunheim

In district court at Thief River Falls on Wednesday a jury awarded Francis D. Bricker a verdict for the sum of $13.50 in an action brought by C. H. Gunheim to enforce the collection of an account which, it was alleged, Bricker owed for merchandise. Bricker put up a counter claim, alleging that Gunheim owed him a balance on account of a lot of hay sold to the merchant last winter.

It seems that Bricker was formerly a steady customer of Gunheim's and being a homesteader, without ready money at all times, he bargained with Gunheim for the hay at a certain price per ton in trade. Bricker hauled in his hay, but Gunheim refused for some reason to stand by the bargain. Bricker declined to trade in any other way, and Gunheim sued. The jury decided that Bricker had something coming and rendered a verdict in his favor.

HOW THEY BEGAN LIFE.

A Paris journalist has amused himself by compiling a list of the occupations followed by some of his countrymen and others before they became more or less illustrious in opera. We are informed that Tamagno, the heroic tenor, remembered as Othello, began his career as a carrier; Van Dyck as a barrister and afterwards a journalist; Dalmores as a cornet player in Lyons (the tenor himself says it was the horn that he played); Alvarez as a bandmaster, and Salignac as a sculptor at Aix, and afterward a violinist at the Marseilles opera. The writer refers to the apprenticeship of no women, except Mlle. Delna, whose real name is Marie Ledant, the contralto who left New York last season with imprecations upon its lack of appreciation. As a girl she served at Meudon, near Paris, in a restaurant owned by her uncle.

EXTRA SESSION PLAN

DEMOCRATS GETTING READY TO MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS.

WORK ON TARIFF BILLS.

Liberation of Philippines and Currency Question May Be Acted On—Appointment Fight to Break.

Washington, Jan. 28.—Although the scope of the legislation to be taken up at the approaching extra session of congress has not yet been outlined, congressional committees are rapidly pushing their preliminary work to a point where recommendations can be made to President-elect Wilson and plans laid before him for the early work of his administration.

Ready for Work.

Work on tariff bills will soon be started. The hearings will be concluded this week.

The "money trust" end of the house banking and currency committee is already working on a report, while the "currency" branch of the same committee will push its investigation this week into other branches of the currency question, in the effort to secure comprehensive suggestions for currency reform.

Senate and house leaders do not yet know what legislation, if any, in addition to the work of tariff revision will be taken up at the extra session.

Some Problems.

Several of those who have talked with President-elect Wilson express the confident belief that the currency question and the question of liberating the Philippines will be included in the new president's scheme of action for his first congressional session.

It is the general opinion in Democratic circles in Washington that Mr. Wilson will at least not "foreclose" congress against acting on everything but the tariff in the special session. A majority of the Democrats in the senate expect little legislation other than the tariff to be taken up, but they believe President Wilson, in calling the special session, will not specifically limit its work.

Would Postpone Currency Action.

An effort is under way by some Democratic senators to postpone action on the currency bill until the next regular session and it is expected that a movement will be promoted to secure an extension of the present Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency law for at least a year, so that an emergency measure will still be at hand in case of industrial or financial disturbances. Under this plan no attempt would be made to legislate on currency questions until next winter.

The full extent of the fight between the Republican and Democratic faction in the senate over President Taft's appointments is expected to develop this week. A Republican caucus probably will be held early in the week and the majority of Republicans now insist there will be no concessions to the Democrats, but that the demand will again be made for confirmation of all of the appointments now before the senate. The house will devote its time this week to the consideration of appropriation bills and by the end of the week it is expected several big supply measures will be ready for the consideration of the senate.

TURMOIL; WAR AGAIN

PEACE DELEGATES ARE RECALLED BY YOUNG TURKS—GOVERNMENT OVERTHROWN.

MANY WOUNDED IN FIGHT

War Minister Killed—Enver Bey Appointed Chief of Staff of Army—Outlook Is Gloomy for Peace Now.

London, Jan. 27.—The confirmation of the news of complete revulsion of feeling in Constantinople against the proposed surrender to the allies has created the impression among the peace delegates that war will begin again almost immediately.

There are, however, two currents of opinion among the representatives of the Balkan league. One of these is in favor of asking Sir Edward Grey, as honorary president of the peace conference, immediately to convoke a session of the delegates at which the resumption of hostilities will be declared. The other urges that the powers should first be allowed to deal with Turkey.

The European governments are already in communication with regard to the situation. The view here is that the reply of Turkey to the note of the powers must be awaited before any drastic action can be inaugurated. Lack of information as to the real meaning and scope of the movement in Constantinople precludes in the official view anything in the nature of peremptory action.

The new Turkish cabinet has decided to recall the Ottoman peace delegates from London, according to a dispatch from Constantinople. The Turkish government is said also to have requested its ambassadors at Vienna and St. Petersburg to return to the Turkish capital. Enver Bey, the most spirited leader of the Young Turks, was today appointed chief of the general staff of the Turkish army.

Constantinople. — Fighting has occurred at several place in the city. A dozen or more persons have been wounded and many arrests have been made. Great public excitement has followed the killing of Nazim Pasha, the former war minister and commander of the Turkish army, who was shot during public demonstrations here.

Talaat Bey, the new minister of the interior, informed the European embassies that all measures to insure the security of the city had been taken. He also addressed circulars to the provincial governors explaining the reasons for the change in the government and calling upon the people to lend their moral and material aid to the government.

Kenyon Gives Pledge.

Des Moines, Iowa, Jan. 24.—"I have a course mapped out to fight a battle in congress in the next two years for human rights, moral laws and decency in politics and legislation," declared Senator W. S. Kenyon in a speech before the Iowa legislature, accepting the re-election tendered him on joint ballot by a vote of 96 against 50 for D. W. Hamilton, Democrat. "The time has come," continued the senator, "when the laboring man must be given a larger share in the wealth he helps to create."

SOCIALIST LEADER ARRESTED

CHARGE AIDING WITNESS TO LEAVE COURT JURISDICTION.

Eugene V. Debs Accuses Prosecutor of Conspiring Against Him.

Terre Haute, Ind., Jan. 27.—Eugene V. Debs, Socialist candidate for president of the United States in the last election has been arrested here on an indictment returned against him in the federal court for the Third district of Kansas. The charge was obstructing justice. The arrest was made by United States Marshals Martin and Rankin from Indianapolis.

The warrant was served in Debs' office and he accompanied the officers to the office of United States Commissioner Hall, where he furnished $1,000 bond for his appearance at the May term of the United States court of the Third Kansas district.

Debs wrote an expose of alleged conditions in the Fort Leavenworth prison for the Appeal of Reason which caused a government investigation. The matter printed in the Appeal was considered obscene by the federal grand jury and action was brought against the editors for sending it through the mails. The witnesses in this case, it is alleged, Mr. Debs encouraged to leave the jurisdiction of the court. Debs brands the indictment as an effort to ruin the Appeal of Reason.

Debs issued a statement after his arrest in which he declared he would fight the case to the limit, that he would employ no counsel, but simply tell his story to a jury.

"The federal prosecutor in Kansas," he said, "hired an ex-convict, it seems, to come to me and plead for financial aid, so that he could go to parts unknown and start life anew. I promised him the means he pleaded for and now I am indicted upon the charge of having attempted to induce a witness to leave the jurisdiction of the court. I presume that if this case comes to trial there will be some interesting developments before it comes to a close."

Levee Being Strengthened.

Vicksburg, Miss., Jan. 25.—Fifteen hundred men are working in day and night shifts trying to save the levees in the third Mississippi engineering district, according to Major A. J. Woodruff engineer in charge of the district. In some places the workers are keeping barely two feet above the rising water, says Major Woodruff. Much attention is being given in the Lake Beulan district where a break during the last flood caused great damage.

Vermont Adopts Electrocution.

Montpelier, Vt., Jan. 27.—Electrocution was substituted for hanging as the official form of capital punishment in Vermont when Governor Fletcher signed a bill to this effect.

J. H. Brady Chosen Senator.

Boise, Idaho, Jan. 27.—James H. Brady, former governor, was elected United States senator for the short term to succeed the late Senator W. B. Heyburn on the first ballot. Brady was elected after his chief opponent, Chief Justice James F. Ailshie, withdrew from the contest. He received 44 votes, two more than was necessary to elect. The legislature had been dead-locked for 11 days, and when Justice Ailshie withdrew the senators from northern Idaho threw their support to Brady.

DOWN TO THE BARE FACTS

Young Minister's Passion for Self-Sacrifice Had Results That Might Have Been Anticipated.

The announcement of Miss Helen Miller Gould's betrothal led one of the charity workers of New York to say:

"Marriage itself will not be able to quench Miss Gould's passion for giving. Apropos to this passion, she once told me a story.

"There was a young minister, the story ran, who, being poor and having nothing else to give, used to give away his clothes.

"The young minister's district contained many needy men, and he would give them shoes and socks, shirts and coats, gloves, overcoats and trousers.

"Yes, time and again he would give away his clothes, foolishly and recklessly, piece by piece, until—"

Here the charity worker smiled.

"Until," she ended, "he came to himself."

WHITE PIMPLES ON HEAD

Ransem, Ill.—"The trouble started on our baby when he was only about two weeks old. Started like little white pimples, looked like an old scab of blood and matter. His whole head was covered for a few months, then it went to his ear, shoulders, and his whole body. It seemed to come out thick and sticky on his head, while on the other parts of his body it was more like water coming out of the skin. He would scratch until the eruption would be all covered with blood and gradually spread. The least little stir or rub would cause the sores to bleed, spread and itch. Never had a full night's sleep, restless all night.

"The sores were horrid to look at. It lasted until he was about two and a half years old. Then we saw an eczema advertisement in the paper to use ———, but it did no good. Then we used Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment. We put the Cuticura Ointment on thick at bed time and put a tight hood on so he could not scratch the sores. Then we washed it clean with Cuticura Soap and warm water twice a day, and he was completely cured." (Signed) Mrs. E. F. Sulzberger, Dec. 30, 1911.

The STOLEN SINGER

by MARTHA BELLINGER

COPYRIGHT 1911 THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

Agatha Redmond, opera singer, starting for an auto drive in New York, finds a stranger sent as her chauffeur. She is annoyed, but he remains. Leaving the car, she goes into the park to read the will of an old friend of her mother, who has left her property. There she is accosted by a stranger, who follows her to the auto, climbs in and chloroforms her. James Hambleton of Lynn, Mass., member of an old New England family, decides he needs a holiday. He goes to New York and there witnesses the abduction of Agatha Redmond. Hambleton sees Agatha forcibly taken aboard a yacht. He secures a tug and when near the yacht drops overboard. Aleck Van Camp, friend of Hambleton, had an appointment with him. Not meeting Hambleton, he makes a call upon friends, Madame and Miss Melanie Reynier. With the latter, Van Camp is very much in love.

CHAPTER IV.—Continued.

"I think my proposition a prior one," he remarked with dogged precision; "but, of course, Miss Reynier must decide." He recovered his temper enough to add, quite pleasantly, considering the circumstances, "Unless Madame Reynier will take my part?" turning to the older woman.

"Oh, no, not fair," shouted Jones. "Madame Reynier's always on my side. Aren't you, Madame?"

Madame Reynier smiled inscrutably. "I'm always on the side of virtue in distress," she said.

"That's me, then, isn't it? The way you're abusing me, Madomoiselle, listening here to Van Camp all the evening!"

But Melanie, tired, perhaps, of being patiently tactful, settled the matter. "I can't go to luncheon with anybody, tomorrow," she protested. "I've had a touch of that arch-enemy, indigestion, you see; and I can't do anything but my prescribed exercises, nor drink anything but distilled water—"

"Nor eat anything but food! We know," cried the irrepressible Jones. "But the Little Gray Fox has a special diet for just such cases as yours. Do come!"

"Heavens! Then I don't want to go there!" groaned Aleck.

Melanie gave Jones her hand, half in thanks and half in farewell. "No, thank you, not tomorrow, but sometime soon; perhaps Thursday. Will that do?" she smiled. Then, as Jones was discontentedly lounging about the door, she did a pretty thing. Turning from the door, she stood with face averted from everybody except Van Camp, and for an instant her eyes met his in a friendly, half-humorous but wholly non-committal glance. His eyes held hers in a look that was like an embrace.

"I will see you soon," she said quietly.

Van Camp said good-night to Jones at the corner, after they had walked together in silence for half a block.

"Good-night, Van Camp," said Jones; then he added cordially: "By the way, I'm going back next week in my private car to watch the opening of the Liza Lu, and I'd be mighty glad if you'd go along. Anything else to do?"

"Thanks—extremely; but I'm going on a cruise."

As Aleck entered the piously exclusive hall of the club his good nature came to his aid. He wondered whether he hadn't scored something, after all.

CHAPTER V.

Melanie's Dreams.

Midnight and the relaxation of slumber could subtract nothing from the high-browed dignity of the club officials, and the message that was waiting for Mr. Van Camp was delivered in the most correct manner. "Mr. Hambleton sends word to Mr. Van Camp that he has gone away on the Jeanne D'Arc. Mr. Hambleton may not be back for some time, and requests Mr. Van Camp to look after the Sea Gull."

"Very well, thank you," replied Aleck, rather absent-mindedly. He was unable to see, immediately, just what change in his own plans this sudden turn of Jim's would cause; and he was for the moment too deeply preoccupied with his own personal affairs to speculate much about it. His thoughts went back to the events of the evening, recalled the picture of his Diana and her teasing ways, and dwelt especially upon the honest, friendly, wholly bewitching look that had flown to him at the end of the evening. Absurd as his own attempt at a declaration had been, he somehow felt that he himself was not absurd in Melanie's eyes, though he was far from certain whether she was inclined to marry him.

Aleck, on his part, had not come to his decision suddenly or impulsively; nor, having arrived there, was he to be turned from it easily. True as it was that he sincerely and affectionately desired Melanie Reynier for a wife, yet on the whole he was a very cool Romeo. He was manly, but he was calculating; he was honorably disposed toward matrimony, but he was not reborn with love. And so, in the sober bedroom of the club, he quickly fell into the good sleep induced by fatigue and healthy nerves.

Morning brought counsel and a disposition to renew operations. A note was dispatched to his Diana by a private messenger, and the boy was bidden to wait for an answer. It came presently:

"Come at twelve, if you wish.

"MELANIE REYNIER."

Aleck smiled with satisfaction. Here was a wise venture going through happily, he hoped. He was pleased that she had named the very hour he had asked for the night before. That was like her good, frank way of meeting a situation, and it augured well for the unknown emergencies of their future life. He had little patience with timidity and traditional coyness in women, and great admiration for an open and fearless spirit. Melanie's note almost set his heart thumping.

But not quite; and no one understood the cool nature of that organ better than Melanie herself. The ladies in the apartment at the Archangel had lingered at their breakfast, the austerity of which had been mitigated by a center-decoration of orchids and fern, fresh-touched with dew; or so Madame Reynier had described them to Melanie, as she brought them to her with the card of Mr. Lloyd-Jones. Miss Reynier smiled faintly, admired the blossoms and turned away.

The ladies usually spoke French with each other, though occasionally Madame Reynier dropped into the harsher speech of her native country. On this morning she did this, telling Melanie, for the tenth time in as many days, that in her opinion they ought to be going home. Madame considered this her duty, and felt no real responsibility after the statement was made. Nevertheless, she was glad to find Melanie disposed to discuss the matter a little further.

"Do you wish to go home, Auntie, or is it that you think I ought to go?"

"I don't wish to go without you, child, you know that; and I am very comfortable here. But his Highness, your cousin, is very impatient; I see that in every letter from Krolvetz. You offended him deeply by putting off your marriage to Count Lorenzo, and every day now deepens his indignation against you. I don't like to discuss these things, Melanie, but I suspect that your action deprives him of a very necessary revenue; and I understand, better than you do, to what lengths your cousin is capable of going when he is displeased. You are, by the law of your country, his ward until you marry. Would it not be better to submit to him in friendship, rather than to incur his enmity? After all, he is your next of kin, the head of your family, and a very powerful man. If we are going home at all, we ought to go now."

"But suppose we should decide not to go home at all?"

"You will have to go some time, dear child. You are all alone, except for me, and in the nature of things you can't have me always. Now that you are young, you think it an easy thing to break away from the ties of blood and birth; but believe me, it isn't easy. You, with your nature, could never do it. The call of the land is strong, and the time will come when you will long to go home, long to go back to the land where your father led his soldiers, and where your mother was admired and loved."

Madame Reynier paused and watched her niece, who, with eyes cast down, was toying with with her spoon. Suddenly a crimson flush rose and spread over Melanie's cheeks and forehead and neck, and when she looked up into Madame Reynier's face, she was gazing through unshed tears. She rose quickly, came round to the older woman's chair and kissed her cheek affectionately.

"Dear Auntie, you are very good to me, and patient, too. It's all true, I suppose; but the prospect of home and Count Lorenzo together—ah, well!" she smiled reassuringly and again caressed Madame Reynier's gaunt old face. "I'll think it all over, Auntie dear."

Madame Reynier followed Melanie into her sitting-room, bringing the precious orchids in her two hands, fearful lest the fragile vase should fall. Melanie regarded them a moment, and then said she thought they would do better in the drawing-room.

"I sometimes think the little garden pink quite as pretty as an orchid."

"They aren't so much in Mr. Lloyd-Jones' style as these," replied Madame Reynier. She had a faculty of commenting pleasantly without the least hint of criticism. This remark delighted Melanie.

"No; I should never picture Mr. Lloyd-Jones as a garden pink. But then, Auntie, you remember how eloquent he was about the hills and the stars. That speech did not at all indicate a hothouse nature."

"Nevertheless, I think his sentiments have been cultivated, like his orchids."

"Not a bad achievement," said Melanie.

There was an interval of silence, while the younger woman stood looking out of the window and Madame Reynier cut the leaves of a French journal. She did not read, however, and presently she broke the silence "I don't remember that Mr. Van Camp ever sent orchids to you."

"Mr. Van Camp never gave me any kind of flower. He thinks flowers are the most intimate of all gifts, and should only be exchanged between sweethearts. At least, I heard him expound some such theory years ago, when we first knew him."

Madame smiled—a significant smile, if any one had been looking. Nothing further was said until Melanie unexpectedly shot straight to the mark with:

"How do you think he would do, Auntie, in place of Count Lorenzo?"

Madame Reynier showed no surprise. "He is a sterling man; but your cousin would never consent to it."

"And if I should not consult my cousin?"

"My dear Melanie, that would entail many embarrassing consequences; and embarrassments are worse than crimes."

Melanie could laugh at that, and did. "I've already answered a note from Mr. Van Camp this morning, Auntie. No, don't worry," she playfully answered a sudden anxious look that came upon her aunt's countenance, "I've not said 'yes' to him. But he's coming to see me at twelve. If I don't give him a chance to say what he has to say, he'll take one anywhere. He's capable of proposing on the street-cars. Besides, I have something also to say to him."

"Well, my dear, you know best; certainly I think you know best," was Madame Reynier's last word.

Mr. Van Camp arrived on the stroke of twelve, an expression of happiness on his lean, quizzical face.

"I'm supposed to be starting on a cruise," he told Melanie, "but luck is with me. My cousin hasn't turned up—or rather he turned up only to disappear instantly. Otherwise he would have dragged me off to catch the first ebb-tide, with me hanging back like an anchor-chain."

"Is your cousin, then, such a tyrant?"

"Oh, yes; he's a masterful man, is Jimmy."

"And how did he 'disappear instantly?' It sounds mysterious."

"It is mysterious, but Jim can take care of himself; at least, I hope he can. The message said he had sailed on the Jeanne D'Arc, whatever that is, and that I was to look after our hired yacht, the Sea Gull."

Melanie looked up, startled. "The Jeanne D'Arc, was it?" she cried "Are you sure? But, of course—there must be many boats by that name, are there not? But did he say nothing more—where he was going, and why he changed his plans?"

"No, not a word more than that. Why? Do you know of a boat named the Jeanne D'Arc?"

"Yes, very well; but it can not matter. It must be another vessel, surely. Meanwhile, what are you going to do without your companion?"

Aleck rose from the slender gilt chair where, as usual, he had perched himself, walked to the window and thrust his hands into his pockets for a contemplative moment, then he turned and came to a stand squarely before Melanie, looking down on her with his quizzical, honest eyes.

"That depends, Melanie," he said slowly, "upon whether you are going to marry me or not."

For a second or two Melanie's eyes refused to lift; but Aleck's firm-planted figure, his steady gaze, above all his dominating will, forced her to look up. There he was, smiling, strong, big, kindly. Melanie started to smile, but for the second time that morning her eyes unexpectedly filled with tears.

"I can't talk to you towering over me like that," she said at last softly, her smile winning against the tears.

Aleck did not move. "I don't want you to 'talk to' me about it; all I want is for you to say 'yes.'"

"But I'm not going to say 'yes;' at least, I don't think I am. Do sit down."

Aleck started straight for the gilt chair.

"Oh, no; not that! You are four times too big for that chair. Besides, it's quite valuable; it's a Louis Quinze."

Aleck indulged in a vicious kick at the ridiculous thing, picked up an enormous leather-bottomed chair made apparently of lead, and placed it jauntily almost beside Miss Reynier's chair, but facing the other way.

"This is much better, thank you," he said. "Now tell me why you think you are not going to say 'yes' to me."

Melanie's mood of softness had not left her; but sitting there, face to face with this man, face to face with his seriousness, his masculine will and strength, she felt that she had something yet to struggle for, some deep personal right to be acknowledged. It was with a dignity, an aloofness, that was quite real, yet very sweet, that she met this American lover. He had her hand in his firm grasp, but he was waiting for her to speak. He was giving her the hearing that was, in his opinion, her right.

"In the first place," Melanie began, "you ought to know more about me—who I am, and all that sort of thing. I am, in one sense, not at all what I seem to be; and that, in the case of marriage, is a dangerous thing."

"It is an important thing, at least. But I do know who you are; I knew long ago. Since you never referred to the matter, of course I never did. You are the Princess Auguste Stephanie of Krolvetz, cousin of the present Duke Stephen, called King of Krolvetz. You are even in line for the throne, though there are two or three lives between. You have incurred the displeasure of Duke Stephen and are practically an exile from your country."

"A voluntary exile," Melanie corrected.

"Voluntary only in the sense that you prefer exile to absolute submission to the duke. There is no alternative, if you return."

Melanie was silent. Aleck lifted the hand which he held, touched it gently with his lips and laid it back beside its fellow on Melanie's lap. Then he rose and lifted both hands before her, half in fun and half in earnestness, as if he were a courtier doing reverence to his queen.

"See, your Highness, how ready I am to do you homage! Only smile on the most devoted of your servants."

Melanie could not resist his gentle gaiety. It was as if they were two children playing at a story. Aleck, in such a mood as this, was as much fun as a dancing bear, and in five minutes more he had won peals of laughter from Melanie. It was what he wanted—to brighten her spirits. So presently he came back to the big chair, though he did not again take her hand.

"I knew you were titled and important, Melanie, and at first I thought that sealed my case entirely. But you seemed to forget your state, seemed not to care so very much about it; and perhaps that made me think it was possible for us both to forget it, or at least to ignore it. I haven't a gold throne to give you; but you're the only woman I've ever wanted to marry, and I wasn't going to give up the chance until you said so."

"Do you know also that if I marry out of my rank and without the consent of Duke Stephen, I shall forfeit all my fortune?"

"'Cut off without a cent!'" Aleck laughed, but presently paused, embarrassed for the first time since he had begun his plea. "I, you know, haven't millions, but there's a decent income, even for two. And then I can always go to work and earn something," he smiled at her, "giving information to a thirsty world about the gill-slit, as you call it. It would be fun, earning money for you; I'd like to do it."

Melanie smiled back at him, but left her chair and wandered uneasily about the room, as if turning a difficult matter over in her mind. Aleck stood by, watching. Presently she returned to her chair, pushed him gently back into his seat and dropped down beside him. Before she spoke, she touched her fingers lightly, almost lovingly, along the blue veins of his big hand lying on the arm of the chair. The hand turned, like a magnet spring, and imprisoned hers.

"No, dear friend, not yet," said Melanie, drawing away her hand, yet not very quickly, after all. "There is much yet to say to you, and I have been wondering how to say it, but I shall do it now. Like the heroes in the novels," she smiled again. "I am going to tell you the story of my life."

"Good!" said Aleck. "All ready for chapter one. But your maid wants you at the door."

"Go away, Sophie," said Melanie "Serve luncheon to Madame Reynier alone. I shall wait; and you'll have to wait, too, poor man!" She looked scrutinizingly at Aleck. "Or are you, perhaps, hungry? I'm not going to talk to a hungry man," she announced.

"Not a bite till I've heard chapter thirty-nine!" said Aleck.

In a moment she became serious again.

"I have lived in England and here in America," she began, "long enough to understand that the differences between your people and mine are more than the differences of language and climate; they are ingrained in our habits of thought, our education, our judgment of life and of people. My childhood and youth were wholly different from yours, or from what an American girl's could be; and yet I think I understand your American women, though I suppose I am not in the least like them

"But I, on the other hand, have seen the dark side of life, and particularly of marriage. When I was a child I was more important in my own country than I am now, since it seemed then that my father would succeed to the throne. I was brought up to feel that I was not a woman, but a pawn in the game of politics. When I had been out of the convent for a year or more, I loved a youth, and was loved in return, but our marriage was laughed at, put aside, declared impossible, because he was of a rank inferior to my own. My lover disappeared, I know not where or how. Then affairs changed. My father died, and it transpired that I had been officially betrothed since childhood to Duke Stephen's brother, the Count Lorenzo. The duke was my guardian, and there was no one else to whom I could appeal; but the very week set for the wedding I faced the duke and declared I would never marry the count. His Highness raged and stormed, but I told him a few things I knew about his brother, and I made him see that I was in earnest. The next day I left Krolvetz, and the duke gave out that I was ill and had gone to a health resort; that the wedding was postponed. I went to France and hid myself with my aunt, took one of my own middle names and her surname, and have been known for some time, as you know, as Melanie Reynier."

"I know you wish to tell me all these things, Melanie, but I do not want you to recall painful matters of the past now," said Aleck gently. "You shall tell me of them at another time."

The color brightened in Melanie's face, her eyes glowed.

"No, not another time; you must understand now, especially because all this preface leads me to what I really want to say to you. It is this: I do not now care for the man I loved at nineteen, nor for any of the other men of my country who have been pleased to honor me with their regard. But ever since those early days I have had a dream of a home—a place different from Duke Stephen's home, different from the homes of many people of my rank. My dream has a husband in it who is a companion, a friend, my equal in love, my superior in strength." Melanie's eyes lifted to meet Aleck's, and they were full of an almost tragic passion; but it was a passion for comprehension and love, not primarily for the man sitting before her. She added simply: "And for my dream I'd give all the wealth, all the love, I have."

The room was very still. Aleck Van Camp sat quiet and grave, his forehead resting on his hand. He looked up, finally, at Melanie, who was beside him, pale and quite worn.

"Poor child! You needed me more than I thought!" was what he said.

But Melanie had not quite finished. "No, that is not enough, that I should need you. You must also need me, want what I alone can give you, match my love with yours. And this, I think, you do not do. You calculate, you remain cool, you plan your life like a campaign, and I am part of your equipment. You are a thousand times better than Count Lorenzo, but I think your principles of reasoning are the same. You do not love me enough, and that is why I can not say yes."

Aleck had taken this last blow standing. He walked slowly around and stood before Melanie, much as he had stood before her when he first asked her to marry him; and this time, as he looked down on her fairness, there was infinite gentleness and patience and love in his eyes. He bent over, lifted Melanie's two hands, and drew her bodily out of her seat. She was impassive. Her quick alertness, her vitality, her passionate seriousness, had slipped away. Aleck put his arms around her very tenderly and kissed her lips; not a lover's kiss exactly, and yet nothing else. Then he looked into her face.

King of American Islands

James Jesse Strang Really Was Crowned and Had Dominion Within the United States.

There frequently appears along Chestnut street a professional beggar who claims to be Henry Strang, a son of America's only king. His tale is greeted as a huge joke, yet the story he tells is true, the only part of it concerning which there may be any doubt being his own connection with it.

The kingdom he refers to was once set up on Beaver island, in northern Lake Michigan, and flourished for some years. James Jesse Strang, a prominent Mormon, had quarreled with the leaders of his church, and in 1846 withdrew with a few followers to that island. Other Mormons joined the colony from time to time, and by the winter of 1848 they were sufficiently numerous to threaten control of the island. On July 8, 1850, Strang was crowned king with elaborate ceremonies. There was much controversy between the Mormons and the other inhabitants of the island, mostly fishermen. While on a visit to Detroit President Fillmore heard of this little kingdom within the domain of the United States. He sent an armed vessel to Beaver island, and King Strang was captured and tried for treason. He conducted his own defense and made such an eloquent plea that he was acquitted. In 1850 he was assassinated.—Philadelphia Record.

CURFEW STILL RINGS

Vicar of Chertsey Church in England Revives Old Custom.

Famous Bell, Cast 600 Years Ago, Tolled Death of King Henry VI.—Gained World-Wide Fame During War of the Roses.

London.—Curfew will be rung tonight and every night from now until March next on the historic old bell of Chertsey Abbey, to whose clapper Blanche Heriot is supposed to have clung, 500 years ago, in the hope of saving her lover's life, as told in the famous poem by Rose Hartwick Thorp.

Probably few of the thousands of people who have read "Curfew Shall Not Ring Tonight," or heard it recited, have any idea that the bell, which its plucky heroine—who is called Bessie in the poem—kept from ringing, still is in existence. On the other hand, such Americans as have visited Chertsey, which is a thriving town, twenty-five miles from London, will have learned all about the Abbey Bell, as it is called, which is considered to be the most historic and oldest ringing bell in England, but which it was left to an American writer to make world-famous.

It was cast 600 years ago. It weighs 1,000 pounds, measures three feet high and nine feet in circumference, and around the crown is a Latin text which may be translated, "Of your charity pray for us, O Virgin Mary." It was ordered cast by John de Rutherwyck, the most famous of the Abbots of Chertsey, and in May, 1471, it tolled the death of the murdered King Henry VI., when his corpse was brought from London by water and found a shelter in Chertsey Abbey until it finally was reburied in St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

In the abbey it is supposed to have been used as the pardon bell, which, previous to the Reformation, was tolled to call the worshippers to a prayer to the Virgin Mary, which preceded the regular service. When the abbey was dismantled, however, its bell was transferred to the "gloomy, shadowed tower" of the parish church of Chertsey, which is named St. Peter's, and also dates back to John de Rutherwyck, and there, "every evening, just at sunset," it "tolled the twilight hour," every evening, that is, except the historic one during the War of the Roses when Blanche Heriot "sprang within the old church door," "mounted up the gloomy tower" and kept the bell from ringing what would have been "fair young Basil's funeral knell." His name, by the way, was nether Basil nor Underwood; it was Nevill, and he was a nephew of Warwick, the King Maker; nor had Cromwell anything to do with the episode, which happened a couple of centuries before the future protector was born. Why Miss Thorp, who, it seems, is still living at San Diego, Cal., transferred the incident from the earlier period to the later, that lady alone knows. She is now sixty-two years old, and among her treasures is a porcelain replica of the famous bell, which was sent to her from Chertsey.

This old abbey or curfew bell now forms the fifth one of a peal of eight in the belfry of the Chertsey parish church. After hundreds of years the ringing of the curfew was abandoned at Chertsey, but it was revived by the present vicar and now is carried out from October 1 to March 25.

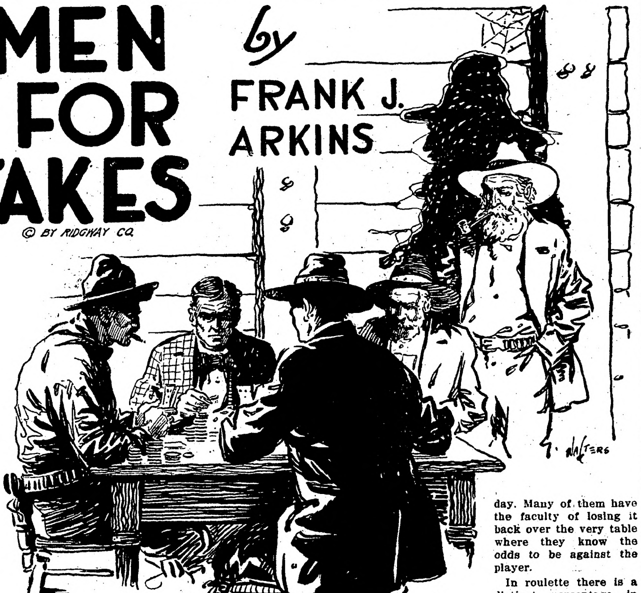
WHEN MEN PLAYED FOR BIG STAKES

by FRANK J. ARKINS



© BY RIDGWAY CO.

GAMBLING for big stakes was a common thing in the west a few years ago. In nearly all sections the evil has been suppressed by law. In the few portions where it is still followed it is carried on under cover and in constant dread of police interference.

Not so long ago, however, the cry of the roulette man and the click of the ball could be heard in the lobbies of many of the principal hotels. This was particularly true of El Paso, Cripple Creek, Leadville, Goldfield, Butte, the Coeur d'Alene, and many other sections. The practice prevailed to a greater or less extent in the larger towns. Everybody has money in the early days of a mining camp.

It was an era of speculation. The country had not "been proven," and hence a "find" in a new section resulted in a great rush to that locality. Property changed hands at fabulous prices overnight. The ragged prospector of today might be rolling in wealth tomorrow. It has happened so many times.

When there is money to throw at the birds, the gamblers, like so many vultures, assemble at the point to which it is being cast by the thoughtless and improvident possessors.

Games were played where the stakes ran into the millions. A man wealthy in the morning sometimes had to borrow money to avoid going to bed hungry at night.

A stockman in Colorado "sat into" a poker game in Denver, and by midnight had not only lost all the cash he had with him, but had exhausted a large bank balance.

He owned, on the range in Colorado, the neutral strip ("No Man's Land," now extreme western Oklahoma), and in Texas ten thousand head of cattle, worth twenty dollars a head, or a total of $200,000.

He possessed land in three states and a handsome residence in Denver. He made a bet of a thousand steers—worth twenty thousand dollars—and lost. He continued this until the herd of ten thousand head of stock belonged to another man. Day dawned, and he was still playing. Breakfast was sent in from a restaurant maintained at the end of the gambling hall for just such people.

"Now," he said to the men who had won his cattle, "you have the critters, but no place to keep them. I will play you my Texas ranch."

He lost that. Then followed the Colorado ranch, finally the residence in Denver, together with the furniture, his horses, his watch and chain. At eight o'clock at night—twenty-four hours later—he was penniless, and started for the Rio Grande country of Texas, where he found employment hauling logs to a sawmill. He had lost more than a quarter of a million dollars in twenty-four hours!

"Will you oblige me by taking off your shoes?" asked a road agent politely, while he held a revolver menacingly in the face of a passenger who stood up in a line with others.

The hold-up man had stopped the stage going into Leadville to "collect toll." He had just purchased the road, he said, and needed the money.

He passed down the line and, by means of a pasenger whom he forced into service, gathered up all the money and jewelry, until he came to the last man in the line. Then he asked the man to take off his shoes. He found four thousand dollars under the inner soles!

Several nights later the man who had been outwitted by the hold-up man was sitting in the dealer's chair of a faro game in the "Cloud City," as Leadville is called. Before him sat a man who lost money steadily. The gambler "raked in" the money carelessly and with the utmost unconcern. The player lost something like five thousand dollars and then pushed back his chair.

"All in?" asked the gambler, arching his brows.

"Yep—you've cleaned me out."

"Then we are even for that little incident the other night, when you collected your road tax from me."

"I——"

"Yes, you!"

The hold-up man knocked down half a dozen loiterers in his rush to reach the door and escape.

A well-known mining man, who was noted for his judgment in "knowing a hole in the ground" when he looked into it, had just made a purchase in Cripple Creek. He had money, and he was willing to spend it for anything that looked good. After having tramped over the hills all of one day, he "sat into" a poker game in the lobby of the principal hotel that night, and engaged in a friendly game with a number of acquaintances.

They were playing for twenty-five cents a corner. While the game was in progress a ragged prospector appeared and attempted to inject himself into the company. The mining man explained that it was simply a private game between friends—outsiders, and particularly strangers, were not wanted.

"I have money that has never been spent."

"We don't know you."

"Oh, that's it! Then let me introduce myself."

There was no way to get rid of him apparently. Then, like an inspiration, and in an annoyed manner, the operator said:

"How much money have you?"

"Eight hundred dollars."

"Sit down, and I'l show you how to play poker."

In less than fifteen minutes the prospector withdrew.

Shortly after he returned with a thousand dollars more. This was interesting. He lost it. Then he lost a diamond pin, following it with a watch and his "cayuse."

When he pushed back his chair the operator asked:

"Are you broke now?"

"I have a claim over on the hill."

"What do you value it at?"

"One hundred thousand dollars."

This staggered the mining man for a moment.

"You have been a good loser; I'll put in with you and play a hundred thousand against your claim."

The prospector lost the claim.

"Now I will play you for your services tomorrow to show me where the claim is and where to open the ore. For that I will consider that you have five thousand on the table."

The prospector lost that.

The next day he traced out the lines of the claim for the winner, who organized a company, with a stock of one million, the shares of which went for sixteen dollars each!

Millions were taken from the mine within a few years. It became one of the most famous in the entire Rocky Mountain country.

In the early days of the Comstock Lode, in Virginia, Nevada, some men made money so fast that they did not know what to do with it. Those who were not making it spent their time devising ways and means to talk the others out of a portion of their wealth. Gamblers were in full evidence, and there were some big stakes; but it remained for a bunch of Mexicans to play for the largest stake on record in the United States—without the use of cards.

One of the many claims, located in the midst of the district, had not shown any ore. Even the men who had millions hesitated to sink a shaft on it. The people were in a fever of excitement. The Mexicans owned practicaly nothing. In fact, the "greasers" could not get a "look in." Altogether it was very discouraging—to them.

Then it occurred to some bright genius to capitalize the labor of the Mexicans. Gathering a bunch of them together, it was proposed that they sink a shaft on one of the well-known claims, which was twelve hundred feet in length.

"For each foot you sink, we will give you a one-foot surface interest in the claim," they were told," provided you sink to ore."

In other words, if they abandoned the work at any time before reaching ore, they would get nothing, and the owners would have the shaft. It looked like a cheap way to prospect.

The Mexicans pow-powed and jabbered at one another for half a night and then started to work.

Everybody laughed. They were comparatively poor men. They could ill afford the expense they were undergoing. They drilled by hand, fought the hard granite, and gradually lowered that shaft. They bailed water that flowed in so fast that it threatened to drown them, but they stuck to the work with desperation.

At three hundred feet they uncovered the richest portion of the world-famous silver deposit, and, from the vein they opened, more wealth was taken out than from any other portion of that richest single mile of ground in the world.

The Mexicans' share was one-quarter. Nearly one hundred million dollars came out of the hole they sank! It was a gamble pure and simple. They played for high stakes—and won.

In the Coeur d'Alene, of Idaho, when that mining region was the center of the earth, there were some big games. The story is told of one man who conceived the idea that he could make money in gambling faster than he could take it out of the ground. It was so much easier. With what cash he had, after selling his mine, he could count up to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

He had evolved a wonderful system.

"I simply can't lose," he told his friends.

His plan was to play steadily for sixteen hours daily, and, by a complicated series of bets, to retrieve when he lost.

Everything went along swimingly for the first few days. At times he was as much as twenty-five thousand to the good.

Nine days after he started top lay he suddenly found that he was just where he had started—he had one hundred and fifty thousand dollars when the cards came a certain way, which would involve, according to his system, betting the entire amount on a single "turn." He played the queen to win, and the fickle creature played false to him.

"Women are the cause of all trouble, anyway," he muttered, as he rose from the table. "I ought to have known better than that, for that was the queen of spades, and I should not have made that bet except when all the queens except the queen of hearts was out."

It was the irony of fate that, when the queen of hearts came out of the box, it so happened that it won.

In the days when Cheyenne, Wyoming, was the headquarters for the cattlemen of the northwest, gambling ran wide open. When the cowboys came to town they made things hum. Money grew on trees. The gaming spirit was in the air.

A dealer standing behind a roulette table one night suddenly motioned the proprietor. A few moments later he was paid off. It is customary to pay a gambler his salary at the end of each day. Many of them have the faculty of losing it back over the very table where they know the odds to be against the player.

In roulette there is a distinct percentage in favor of "the house." Everybody knows that.

This dealer took a seat in front of the table and in the course of a few hours had won fifty dollars. Then he stopped. He would pass in and out a dozen times a day, play a little here and some there, but always he would bring up in front of the roulette table, and more often than otherwise left it winner. His luck was amazing. He started a bank acocunt. He was saving his money to get into business with, he said.

He won so steadily that it made the proprietor of the place shiver every time he came in.

One day, while the ex-dealer was playing, an old man dropped in and, glancing around the room for a moment, asked:

"Who runs this place?"

"I do," answered a bewhiskered individual who was watching his former employe rake in the cash.

"Will you do me the favor to tell me where you got that wheel?" he asked, pointing to the one that proved such a hoodoo.

"I know it's a Jonah. That fellow over there wins all the time."

"So?" said the stranger.

He walked over and watched the man lay his bets.

Returning to the proprietor, he said, as he passed out a card:

"I represent this house, which, as you see, deals in gaming devices. I take it that the man sitting at the wheel makes a 'killing' every day?"

"He does, stranger, to the tune of fifty or a hundred."

"For a thousand I can tell you how to bust his luck and make him look the living picture of remorse. You would have to agree to purchase a new wheel from me, also."

"If you show me, I'm game."

"It's a bargain," said the drummer.

Walking over to the wheel, he waited until the ball dropped, stopped it, and turning to the proprietor asked:

"See anything strange with that wheel?"

"No."

"Well, see, there are two nineteens and two twenty-threes on this wheel. They are unusual numbers—so that the fellow who plays them has about the same percentage in his favor, on those numbers, that you have when a man plays on a regular wheel. We made this wheel more than thirty years ago. It was sold to a house by a couple of 'sure thing' men, who almost broke the outfit. Then we lost track of it."

The ex-dealer had noticed the double numbers, and therein was the secret of his "luck." How the numbers had escaped attention so many years is one of those mysteries of gambling that can never be explained.

When Seattle was the big noise in the Northwest gambling world, and the primeval forests were closer to her doors, some big games were played.

One night a stranger stepped into one of the principal houses and took a seat at a faro table. An hour later he had lost more than five thousand dollars. The proprietor sent him a fifty-cent cigar. A few moments afterward the stranger had a couple of hundred dollars, and within an hour had regained his five thousand. Then commenced a streak of luck that has seldom been witnessed in any gambling house. The "roof" had been raised "to the sky" and Mr. Stranger "coppered" the king and doubled a bet of five thousand. He tried it again for a repeater, with ten thousand, and drew back twenty yellow chieps, worth one thousand each.

After that he made bets of a thousand each, and before he had smoked the cigar he was twenty-eight thousand to the good! Then he quit.

Who he was, where he came from, where he went, no one ever knew. His coming and going were as mysterious as his winnings were sensational.

Probably one of the greatest stakes ever hung up was raked down on a mule race in Arizona. A man owned a "hole in the ground." He was satisfied that it was worth a fortune. His friends thought he was crazy. He refused to go to other "diggings" where the prospects were better. He was more than twenty-five miles from water, which had to be carried in on the hurricane deck of a mule. He worked away, nursing his claim and sticking it out alone. Then he went to a settlement some distance away. He became excited over the performances of a mule owned by another man, and in a moment of exuberance bet his claim against one owned by a prospector from another section that his mule could outrun the other fellow's. He lost.

He had the privilege of piloting the winner to the "mine" and saw him take more than seventy thousand dollars' worth of silver, net, out of a pocket, almost on the surface of the ground! Since then the property has produced millions. It all came about because one mule could not run so fast as another.

JUDICIOUS MANAGEMENT OF FALL COLTS

Excellent Types of Farm Animals.

(BY W. M. KELLY.)

There are many reasons why the practice of breeding the farm mares for fall colts should prove advantageous; however, very few farmers have made it a success.

To be sure a mare can rear her foal very nicely during the winter and if she fails to get with foal in the spring there is no good reason why she should be allowed to miss the whole year, but as a general thing the spring colts pay best.

Spring is the natural season for mares to bring forth their young. This is not the most important reason, but we all know that grass is the best food for young foals, that is, of course when properly supplemented with grain.

In the winter when fed dry roughage the effect upon its digestive system is far inferior to that of grass, and too, there is the question of plenty of exercise and sunshine.

English Champion Shire.

Colts need plenty of exercise and sunshine to build up strong muscles and sinews. In the cold weather he is kept in the stable most of the time. Kept confined in a stall during the winter his feet are sure to grow crooked unless intelligent care is taken of them.

In the summer the natural wear and tear of traveling about the pasture keeps his feet in ideal shape so that a very little attention is required to keep them of the right length.

As a general thing the milk that a mare gives during the winter is of rather an uncertain quality. The amount of milk a mare produces is not large, even on grass. In the winter when she is fed dry roughage and grain her production is very small. Of course this can be supplemented by the milk of a cow but the feeding of cow's milk to young foals is a matter which requires the most painstaking care and even then the results are not always satisfactory.

Still another advantage of rearing spring colts is the fact that weaning period comes when the mare is naturally going dry.

Horses, like other domestic animals, are highly artificial products. However, the greatest success is attained by raising them as nearly as possible in their natural state. Plenty of green grass, sunshine, exercise and the added milk production of the mare are the principal reasons why spring foals are best.

On the other hand, many farmers who advocate breeding for fall colts, claim that they can get better service out of their mares during the spring's work. On my own farm I have never been able to see much in this claim.

Grain harvesting are fully as hard work as plowing and cultivating. Any fair-minded man will agree that hauling a corn binder when the temperature is around 90 degrees is no suitable work for brood mares that are heavy with foal. No matter what season of the year, common sense must be exercised in the care and handling of work mares that are heavy with foal if one is to succeed in raising good colts.

It does not require a great deal of skill to raise a fall colt if good sense is exercised in the process. If the foal is shut up in a tight stall and compelled to stand on manure and filth it is sure to produce unsoundness at the very beginning.

If your mares foal in the fall plan to provide plenty of room for the foals to run about and pick bits of food here and there as they please. Give them a little cow's milk and encourage them to eat when they please. Allow them to run about even if the weather is quite cold and snappy.

Feed the mares plenty of milk-making foods such as carrots, mangles, ground oats and wheat bran. Good care and plenty of good food and exercise will bring the colt through to grass in fine shape.

Then, when he is turned out to pasture feed him a small ration of dry roughage until the grass becomes dry and hard. Grain may profitably be fed all summer but the hay feeding may be safely discontinued after the grass becomes hardened.

QUESTION OF DEEP PLOWING DISCUSSED

Some Very Striking Increases in Production Have Been Secured by Method.

(By E. J. KINNEY, Kentucky Experiment Station.)

During the last few years some very striking increases in production have been secured by plowing very deeply. On the strength of this a number of authorities are advocating deep plowing for the south. They advise from eight to as much as sixteen inches deep. It seems somewhat dangerous to the orthodox man to give such general advice as this until we have more experimental data to confirm its value. It is undoubtedly true that much deeper plowing than is now practiced in most sections of the south is desirable.

No cultivated crop can make its best growth in a seed bed less than seven inches deep. Where soils are so thin that plowing to this depth will bring up a large quantity of raw subsoil the depth should be attained by plowing a little deeper each time instead of taking the full depth all at once. In this way the subsoil will have a chance to become weathered and incorporated with the surface soil.

Some advocates of deep plowing propose to go to the desired depth all at once. We are not prepared to say whether they are right or wrong. However, the safest plan is to try it on a small scale at first. Deep plowing is expensive and must show decided benefits if it is to be profitable. Let several join and purchase a plow for deep tilling and give it a good trial under fair conditions. This will be safe and not expensive. It is worth trying, and the experience will be of value to other farmers.

It would be a good thing if farmers trying new methods would make a practice of reporting results, whether profitable or not. One difficulty in deciding the merits of any practice is that the successful ones report, while those who fail do not.

PREVENT DISEASES OF GARDEN CROPS

Foundation of Success Next Year Will Depend Upon Pure Seed and Good Soil.

(By E. C. STAKMAN, Assistant in Pathology, Minnesota College of Agriculture.)

If the soil is made sanitary by disease control, a large annual loss in garden crops will be avoided when the seed is gathered from last year's crop is planted in the spring. It may be laid down as a principle that the foundation of success next year will depend upon the care which is given to keep the seed free from disease and to prevent the soil from becoming unsanitary.

One vegetable which is directly concerned is the potato. The tubers of the potato plant may be troubled with a number of diseases. In Minnesota, the potato scab and the internal brown rot must be contended with. Both diseases live in the soil and tubers, and it is necessary that the soil be free from the disease if next year's crop is to be a large one. If diseased seed or soil be used year after year, the yield of the sound potatoes becomes smaller and smaller.

Other common crops which are affected with disease in Minnesota are the bean, cabbage, onion and beet. Many of the diseases are so serious as to endanger the production of paying crops. Some of the seed may be diseased, and yet show no trace of disease. Bean anthracnose, bean bacteriosis and black rot of cabbage are among the diseases.

To prevent disease from obtaining a hold, spraying should be done wherever possible. If the soil is diseased, rotation of crops must be resorted to. Only by such attention can permanent success be assured.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

Edited by Albert Keyzer

HUNTING THE GANG

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

ON March 3rd, 1892, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, three men entered the wineshop in the Rue Saint-Denis, kept by M. Desvois, at the corner of the Rue de la Grande Truanderie. They ordered a bottle of wine, and went upstairs for a game of billiards. Of the two doors in the billiard-room, one opened into the bedroom, whilst the other led to the entrance in the Rue de la Grande Truanderie. After half an hour Mme. Desvois, not hearing the noise of the billiard balls, went upstairs, and, to her surprise, saw the door of the bedroom ajar. At that moment one of the men came forward, and Mme. Desvois, convinced they were burglars, called for help. At her shrieks the three fellows rushed out, knocked her over, and ran away. Two of them escaped unseen, by the back door, but the third found himself in the Rue de la Grande Truanderie followed by a crowd attracted by the woman's cries. On the point of being overtaken, the man drew a revolver, fired at a youth who had seized his coat tails, and shot him down. The mad chase continued towards the Rue Pierre-Lescot, where he fired again, killing a cabinet-maker called Martinot. M. Bottelier, an employe, was his third victim; for the poor man, with a bullet in the groin, died on his way to the hospital. The murderer sped along, brandishing his weapon, when a M. Guyomard caught him pluckily by the throat and felled him to the ground. The police had the greatest trouble to prevent him from being lynched. With his clothes torn to shreds, and bleeding from several wounds, he was first conveyed to the police-station in the Rue des Prouvaires, and afterwards brought before me.

He was a short, thick-set, determined-looking man with a strongly-developed jaw, and a curious hard expression in the eyes—the type of the brute. He gave his name as Crampon; and we discovered that under the name of Bonfantini he had already undergone several long terms of imprisonment.

When I asked him for the names of his accomplices he looked at me with an ugly grin.

"What for? To obtain favors? No, thank you. I am not going to harm them. Besides, I am sick of everything. I want to be 'butte.'"*

"Are you sorry you killed these poor men?"

"Sorry? Not I. Or, rather, I am sorry; for I had still two shots in my revolver; and, but for that meddling idiot, you would not see me here today."

I did not prolong this conversation, and waited till the next day, when I had him once more brought before me, and again questioned him about his accomplices.

"Save yourself the trouble," he said with a sneer, "you'll get nothing out of me. I want to be 'butte.'"

Crampon had a sweetheart, a certain Maria Thouvenin, then lying ill at the Charite hospital. I searched her room, and found a uniform of a private in the Fourth Infantry, which I took away with me.

The excitement in Paris, when that horrible murder became known, was intense and the press clamored for the arrest of the two men who accompanied Crampon on that fatal afternoon. Unfortunately, Mme. Desvois was unable to give me their description, and none of my men, although well acquainted with the criminals and their haunts, could supply any clue.

I sent for Inspector Larose—an experienced official—and described to him a fellow I had seen some months ago with Crampon enter a bar.

Larose thought a long time and then said:

"Well, sir, I think I know the man, but I doubt whether he belongs to the Crampon gang."

"He may or he may not. I noticed his hair; it was cut short and looked as if he had just left the regiment."

Larose looked up.

"I begin to see it now, sir; it would be funny if he turned out to be our man. His name is Georges Plessis, and he is employed in a wineshop in the Rue du Bac."

"All right; let us go there at once."

Twenty minutes later we alighted and enquired after Plessis.

"He will be done in a minute," said the proprietor of the establishment; "he is bringing down his trunk."

"His trunk?" I asked. "Is he going away?"

"Yes, sir. He had a telegram, last night, from his old aunt, who is very ill."

Whilst he spoke, Plessis came down the stairs with a big box on his shoulder, and nearly dropped it when he saw us. We put him in the cab, and took him, box and all, to the prefecture, where he denied ever having seen Crampon.

"Why were you so anxious to leave Paris?" I said.

"I had a telegram——"

"Yes, I know. But I want to ask you why you did not do your military service? You are a defaulter."

"I defaulter!" he cried. "I have served my time; and in a fine regiment, too."

"Where?"

"In the Fourth Infantry."

"What has become of your uniform?"

"My uniform? My uniform? I—I—must have lost it."

"I think I have found it. Undo that parcel in the corner, and put on the coat and trousers."

He did so, and they fitted him like a glove.

"You left them with Maria Thouvenin," I said, "and you had better make a clean breast of it."

He reflected a moment, and then confessed having been with Crampon on the day of the murder; but, like Crampon, he positively refused to give the name of the other man.

"I'll tell you all about myself, M. Goron, but I'll never round on my pal; no, never. And I'll bet you'll never catch him either."

"We will see about that," I replied.

The following morning I sent again for Inspector Larose.

"Larose," I began, "Plessis two years ago broke his leg, and was nursed at Mangin's house by that man's sister. They are great pals?"

"Yes, sir. And he even wanted to marry the girl.

"Right. Then arrest Mangin for being implicated in this affair and bring him here at once."

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I am certain Mangin had nothing to do with this business."

"So am I; and that is why I want you to bring him to me."

No doubt it seems horrible that I should arrest a man I knew to be innocent. But I saw no other way of laying my hands on a desperate character, who, at any moment, might have slipped through my fingers. And, before too much sympathy is wasted on Mangin, it should be remembered that this gentleman had spent about a third of his life in prison. He and Plessis belonged to the worst class of criminals. But I had had frequent opportunities of noticing that one chord, that of friendship, would vibrate in men of even that stamp; and it was on that I based the experiment I was about to make.

Mangin had been so often in custody that he did not look upset when he was marched into my office. And as he knew he was innocent of the crime imputed to him, he could afford to be sarcastic.

"What's the use," he said, "of hauling me in, when the fish who did the mischief is still swimming about? I was not in this affair."

"That remains to be seen."

"I was not in this affair," he repeated violently.

"Hold your tongue. You and Plessis were both in it."

After I had worked him to a high pitch of excitement I sent for Plessis, and then witnessed a curious scene, the one on which I had reckoned.

When Plessis was ushered in, and saw Mangin, he seemed dumbfounded, but he greeted him heartily with a:

"Bon jour, mon vieux!"

The other glared at him.

"You are a nice kind of friend," he hissed, "to denounce a pal you know to be innocent. You scoundrel!"

"I swear," shrieked Plessis, "I never mentioned your name! Ask M. Goron—ask him."

"He speaks the truth," I interposed; "he refused to give me the name of the third man who went with Crampon that afternoon to the Rue Saint-Denis; but, as I feel sure you, Mangin, are that man, I had you arrested."

Mangin growled and turned on Plessis.

"Am I to understand that in order to screen a pal of yours who took part in this business you actually let me, your best friend, suffer?"

If at that moment a member of the French academy, whose duty it is to expurge every strange word from our language, had entered my room he would have been horrified. For I and these two men were talking "the green tongue"—as it is called here—the slang in which Paris criminals feel so much more at home than in honest French. To the fact of my being able to converse in that queer idiom I attribute, in some measure, the influence I always have had over members of that class.

"Two years ago," continued Mangin, "when you had come to grief, and the police——"

"Shut up, you fool," shouted the angry Plessis.

"I shan't shut up, you white-livered sneak. You want to leave me in quod, when you know I had no hand in this? Look here, M. Goron, as he refuses to speak, I will. And you shall know something about this——"

"Stop your talk," bawled Plessis, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, "I give in; it's no use fighting any longer. M. Goron, my friend is innocent; he was never near the place on that day. Let him go, and I'll tell you who it is you are after."

He paced the room in uncontrolled agitation, talking rapidly as if to get the load off his mind.

"It is Joseph Simetiere. And now don't ask me anything else—for I shall not answer."

He then looked expectantly at Mangin, and the two shook hands. I rang the bell.

"This man," I said, pointing to Mangin, "is to be released."

And he walked away, proud at having only been three hours in custody, a thing which, I am sure, had never happened to him before.

Joseph Simetiere was a dangerous bandit. No time had to be lost, and that same night I went in search of him, accompanied by two of my men.

I knew Simetiere was a frequenter of a low dancing place in the Rue Montagne-Sainte-Genevieve, where the worst characters congregated. At an early hour I went there with my companions, whom I left a little distance off, and walked straight into a small room, from which, through a window closed by a curtain, everything could be seen that went on in the hall. This closet bore the curious name of "the Grand Duke's observatory," for it was from there that two of the Russian grand dukes had once watched the entertainment.

"Do you expect Joseph Simetiere tonight?" I asked the proprietor, who had every reason to assist the police.

"Yes, he comes here constantly. But his pals are always with him, and in your stead I would——"

"Thank you. I do not want your advice. Stay here, and tell me when he enters."

After an hour he called out:

"Here he is!"

Simetiere, a sinister-looking scoundrel, with three men and a woman, all desperate characters, sat down, ordered drinks, and started a conversation, which, above the squeak of fiddles and the thumping of feet, I could not hear. It was fortunate I had taken the precaution of locking the door, for the woman crossed the hall, and—I do not know for what reason—tried to come in. When I saw the fellow rise, I stole out, and joined my companions, whom I conducted to a dark doorway by which Simetiere had to pass.

"It is no good making a selection," I whispered to my men, "we must take our chance."

A few minutes after midnight we saw Simetiere come down the street. One of his friends walked by his side; the others were a few yards behind. The instant the two were level with us we rushed at them and before they could utter a cry they were bound, thrown into a cab, and taken off.

The other man we had arrested was Thevenin, an old offender, and this, as it turned out, proved a lucky haul, for the next morning, when Simetiere was brought before me, he scowled angrily, and said:

"I am sure it is that coward Thevenin who has rounded on me; and I'll be even with him. Yes, I was in the affair of the Rue Saint-Denis; but Thevenin, that ugly rat, was the third man."

This was at variance with what Plessis had told me. But instead of doubting Simetiere's statement I guessed that Plessis had only told me half the truth and that there was a fourth. My supposition proved correct, for, having confronted Crampon with the other three, it turned out that while Crampon with Simetiere and Thevenin had gone to the billiard-room in the wine-shop, Plessis had kept watch outside, which accounted for the fact that no one had seen him.

The public were delighted when it was announced that the men in connection with the Rue Saint-Denis crime were in custody; but I was not satisfied. Crampon was the head of a gang who had been, or were still, committing depredations, and I could not rest until that whole pack had been routed. And I may remark here that the post of chief of the Paris detective police is not a bed of roses. He certainly disposes of men in whose courage he can place reliance; but when a dangerous expedition on a big scale is planned, the chief has to place himself at their head and risk his life—like they do.

I had also to overcome a serious difficulty, that of laying my hand on the whole lot in one swoop; for I knew full well that if I caught only two or three the rest would disappear, and I should have to start a fresh hunt. I, therefore, sent for Latrille, an active young officer, who possessed the talent of disguising himself in such a marvelous manner that I often failed to recognize him when I met him in one of the passages of the prefecture. I instructed him to watch the gang, and keep me informed of their movements. Their favorite meeting-place was a low tavern in the Rue Aubry-le-Boucher.

A few days later, Latrille told me that the whole gang were to meet that evening, whereupon I made all my arrangements.

One by one, so as not to awaken any suspicion, we met in a passage close by that tavern, whence, unseen, we could watch the neighborhood. The night was dark, and the street bore an indescribably gloomy look. But, instead of the silence that would befit such a place, the air was rent with sounds of scuffles and brawls. Occasionally shrieks would be heard, shrieks that would not affect anybody about there. Little they cared whether it was an ordinary quarrel or murder; whatever it might be, it was common enough in the Rue Aubry-le-Boucher. A villainous-looking man grabbed a woman by the throat, and, with curses, demanded something that she kept hidden beneath her cloak. But, quick as lightning, she whipped out a knife, whereupon the fellow slunk off, and she continued her way as if nothing had occurred.

At a quarter past one a shabby-looking individual, with a dirty rag over his left eye, passed our hiding-place, and, turning sharply around, whispered:

"Come, quick; now is the time!"

It was Latrille.

I placed myself at the head of my men, and in less than a minute we were in the den, a narrow room, with a small bar covered with zinc, tables and chairs along the wall. Half a dozen ruffians were sitting there, listening attentively to one of their party, who was emphasizing his words with a bottle he held in his hand.

And then the scramble began. Three were overpowered before they could make use of their weapons; but the others fought like savages. One, with a knife between his teeth, had barricaded himself behind a table, and fired revolver shots at us; while the other two, armed with huge knives, threw themselves upon those nearest to them. Brunet received an ugly gash in the thigh, and poor Larose was shot in the leg. Suddenly one of my men shouted:

"Look out, sir."

I turned quickly, and saw a fellow, who had been hiding underneath a table, pointing a pistol at me. But the arm that held it was caught, wrenched backward, and, with a howl, he fell on the floor. In less than five minutes everything was over, and my prisoners, carefully handcuffed, were conveyed to the prefecture.

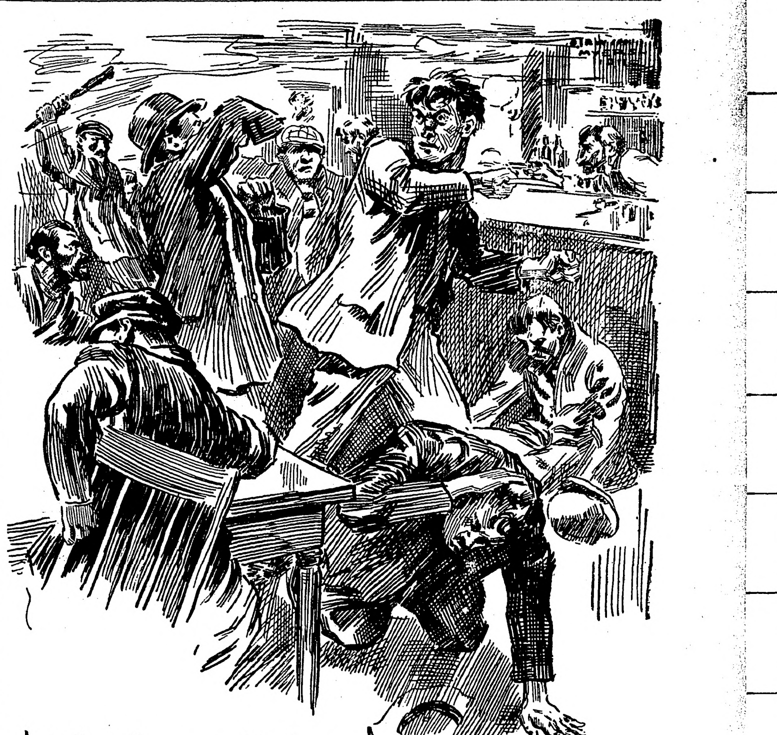
Then came the day of reckoning. Crampon and his accomplices were committed for trial. Of the eight who were arraigned, seven were sent to penal servitude; but Crampon, the murderer, was sentenced to death. The latter, who had told me twice that he wanted to be, as he called it, "butte," had hoped that his sentence would be commuted to transportation for life; but on the sixteenth of December, in the afternoon, I was officially informed that his execution would take place the following day.

At five o'clock the next morning, Deibler, the executioner, arrived on the Place de la Rouquette to build up the guillotine; and punctually at seven I followed M. Beauquesne, the governor of the Roquette prison, into Crampon's cell. The examining magistrate, the police commissary of the Roquette district, two other officials, and three warders accompanied us. When we entered, Crampon, who was sitting on his bed, turned livid.

"Crampon," said M. Beauquesne, "the moment of expiation has arrived."

The condemned man tried to speak, but we heard nothing but a rattling sound. The warders helped him to dress, and we left him alone with the priest, the Abbe Valladon. He then was conducted to the "Salle du Griffe," a dismal room with a stone floor, and, in the center, a small stool on which the culprit sits to submit to the "toilette," which consists in cutting his hair and shirt around the shoulders, and pinioning him. When Crampon felt the cold steel of the scissors on his neck, he shuddered, and uttered a faint cry.

A few minutes later the heavy doors of the prison were thrown open, and the sad procession appeared. First came Deibler, and behind him Crampon, supported by two of the executioner's assistants. Thus far he had shown a certain amount of courage. When, however, he caught sight of the horrible machine, he seemed paralysed. Deibler's men had to carry him; and when, a few seconds later, the knife dropped, I was almost certain that it had fallen on a lifeless body.



And then the scramble began.

GOOD-BYE TO AN OLD PIANO

"I've been thinking the matter over," said the tall commuter, "and I've about come to the conclusion that the younger generation of the present day is thoroughly devoid of sentiment."

"I wish my wife could hear you," dissented the commuter's neighbor. "Within the comparatively short space of eight months, no less than five trembling ladies have fluttered forth into the world, via our back kitchen step. You mightn't think it from just a casual survey of our modest establishment, but, sir, we have harbored not only sentiment of the native-born variety, but have encountered the imported sort as well. Did you ever chance to overhear a Polish lover telling his heart's delight what he thought of her?"

"Could anyone live in this particular suburb and not hear it?" asked the tall commuter sadly; "but that is not the kind of sentiment to which I refer. What I have in mind is the sentiment that attaches to things or places with which one has been associated for a long time."

"Well," said the seatmate, "my experience is this. I find that when I have been associated with 'things' a long time, they wear out, and in nine cases out of ten the only sentiment I can scare up is intense annoyance. Take my typewriter machine as a case in point. The 'sentiments' that I harbor for that hoary piece of mechanism would melt the type, should I endeavor to reduce them to print."

"My wife and I went over to visit her mother last night," said the tall commuter, ignoring, after a happy fashion all his own, his companion's remarks about his typewriter, "and when we got there we saw as neat a bit of twentieth century callousness as I ever laid my eyes on. All the youths of the neighborhood were gathered in the family sitting room, around one of those 'horseless pianos' that my in-laws have just acquired. As the poets say, 'joy reigned supreme.' They were waltzing and two-stepping, and singing and chorusing, and committing more offenses against the laws of harmony by their failures to keep on the key than I can bear to remember."

"It's news to me that you are a high-brow where music is concerned," said the skeptical listener.

"I have the privilege of knowing what I like, havent I?" inquired the upholder of sentiment loftily; "but as a matter of fact, I did not start this conversation for the purpose of revealing the capacity of my younger in-laws to commit musical murder."

"You make the same mistake every day, don't you?" asked the fellow-traveler, innocently. "You always call your monologues 'conversations.'" The tall commuter grinned. "What I want to show up is their inhuman indifference to the faithful old piano that has withstood their combined poundings. There it stood in a corner of the piazza, where they had obligingly rolled it so as to facilitate the work of getting rid of it when the firm from which they had bought the new piano should send for the worn-out old giant the next day."

"Well, you know, they do worse to square pianos than stand them out on nice dry porches nowadays," announced the unsympathetic auditor. "Why, I read not long ago about a manufacturer who burned up five hundred of them out in his back lots. It was bad for the pianos, but good for business, you know."

"I'm not one to block the wheels of progress, you know that," said the tall commuter, "but I would have liked it if even one of the youngsters had remembered the good times that old piano had given him or her. If he had thought even once of the children's parties, when my wife, who is the big sister of the family, used to play all sorts of lively little jig tunes for them, when they danced the 'Virginia Reel' and 'Going to Jerusalem.' They used to have family singing of an evening. Why, one of the things that helped me fall in love with my wife was the picture she used to make as she sat and played for her herd of little sisters and brothers as they sang their Sunday evening hymns."

"Did they sing any better than you say they do now?" breathed the listener, guardedly.

As usual, the tall commuter ignored him. "My wife," he went on, "felt just as I did about it, and when we were going home we shut the door on that crowd of vandals and went around to the side of the piazza to take a good-bye look at the old piano."

"I thought your eyes looked a trifle red this morning," said the unfeeling confidant.

"If I didn't know you to be a thousand per cent better than you sound, I'd rather choose another seat for my daily trip," announced the tall commuter. "Well, we went around to say good-bye to the old piano, and my wife told me the first flowers I ever sent her were lying on the piano when she came in from school—you know, she used to teach. They were lilies-of-the-valley, and it was deep winter. I don't remember having luncheon downtown for a month after buying them."

"For a sentimentalist, your memory of the flowers seems material enough."

"Then, I had forgotten this, but my wife says she had just stopped playing when I asked her to marry me."

"An uncontrollable burst of gratitude on your part, I dare-say," chuckled the Philistine.

"Say," anonunced the tall commuter, "I'm going to finish these remarks about my in-laws' old piano, whether you like it or not. We, well, we finished our adieus, and started home, when my wife ran back. She said she had forgotten something, but, do you know, I bet a dollar she ran back to kiss that old piano good-bye."

"Well, well," mused the seatmate, "it seems like a terrible waste of good material, when a nice little lady like your wife lavishes caresses on ao mahogany case. But it is a good trait to stick to old friends, even inanimate ones. I've no doubt my wife would do the same."

"Sure she would," agreed the tall commuter. "That new conductor with the megaphone voice is getting ready to shout 'Woodside, change for Pennsylvania station.'"

THE BANKS OF CANADA

The closing of the year 1912 has brought out the usual bank statements accompanied by the addresses of the Presidents and General Managers of these institutions. Their reading is interesting as they show in a striking manner the prosperity of the country, and deal with economic matters in a first hand way. Those who know anything of Canadian banking methods know the stability of these institutions, and the high character of the men who are placed in charge. In discussing the land situation the President of the Union Bank of Canada, whose branches are to be found in all parts of the Canadian West, said:—

"A good deal has been said about speculation in land. The increase in land values has added enormously to the assets of Western business, and has to some extent formed a basis for extended credit, but this is not felt to be a drawback when the value is real and convertible. We consider that a business standing which is strengthened and enhanced by property holdings is entitled to a reasonable enlargement of credit for legitimate business operations."

It will thus be seen that the banks recognize the certain rise in the value of farm lands in Western Canada. When the facts are known of the wonderful producing qualities of farm lands in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, it is simple to understand the liberal stand taken by the banks.

Living not far from Lashburn, Sask., is a farmer named Clarke who in 1912 secured a crop of Marquis Wheat, yielding 76 bushels per acre. This is spoken of as a record yield, and this is doubtless true, but several cases have been brought to notice where yields almost as large have been produced, and in different parts of the country. During the past year there have been reported many yields of from 35 to 45 bushels of wheat to the acre. Oats, too, were a successful crop, and so was the barley crop. Wheat that would yield 40 bushels per acre, would bring on the market 70c (a fair figure) per bushel, a gross return of $28.00 per acre. Allow $12.00 per acre (an outside figure) there would be a balance of $16.00 per acre net profit. This figure should satisfy anyone having land that cost less than $100.00 per acre. Very much less return than this proves satisfactory to those holding lands in Iowa and Illinois worth from $250 to $300 per acre.

The latest Government returns give an approximate estimate of four hundred thousand of an immigration to Canada during 1912. Of this number 200,000 will be from the United States. Most of these are of the farming class and it is not difficult to understand why farming lands in Canada will advance from ten to twenty per cent. within the next twelve months. Therefore investment in Western Canadian lands is not looked upon as being in the speculative class. Those fortunate enough to secure free homesteads in Canada will acquire in the intrinsic value of the land alone the best possible start for a splendid future. Advertisement.

Her Great Love.

They had already celebrated the fact that the mistletoe hung in the hall, and now they were occupying not only one settee, but also the entire drawing room.

"Could you love me, darling," he murmured, as the thought of the sprig of mistletoe came to him again, "if I possessed only one coat in the wide, wide world?"

She looked up into his eyes as she framed her reply.

"I could," she said, "if I knew you had sacrificed the others to buy me a new dress!"

Worldly—and True.

Apropos of Miss Lois Campbell's "billion-dollar debut in St. Louis, Claude H. Wetmore, the author, said:

"The marvelous growth and prosperity of our city is a phenomenon that holds the eye of all America. Before such wealth as ours one thinks involuntarily of the worldly cynicism:

"'There are other things in the world besides money—and money will buy them all.'"

Thousands of nervous, discouraged, sickly women have traced their troubles to sick kidneys — have found quick and thorough relief through using Doan's Kidney Pills. The painful, trying times of woman's life are much easier to bear if the kidneys are well.

WAGE HOTEL FIGHTS

SEVERAL THOUSAND EMPLOYES OF HOSTELRIES JOIN IN RIOTING.

SCORES HURT IN MELEE.

One Proprietor's Life Threatened—Windows as High as Sixth Floor Broken by Stones and Bricks.

New York, Jan. 27.—A series of demonstrations and disturbances occurred in the hotel and restaurant district of this city when thousands of striking waiters and sympathizers overran some of the principal streets and engaged in serious rioting.

The rioting followed successes by several thousand hotel employes in crippling the dining service in a number of big hotels. Failing to tie up other hostelries and restaurants, the riotous elements carried on a warfare of jostling patrons, turning in false alarms of fire, attacking waiters, who have not walked out, and throwing bricks through windows.

Jostle Theatre Crowds.

When the theatre audiences began to pour forth, the disturbers were still overflowing the sidewalks. Men and women in evening clothes were forced into the streets as gangs of idlers swept down upon them. Many fights resulted when escorts retaliated with fists.

The life of one proprietor, James B. Regan of the Hotel Knickerbocker, has been threatened, it is said. Regan has thrown a guard of 60 special policemen, each man more than six feet tall, around his hotel, and has announced his intention of keeping rioting waiters away from his doors. Regan Thursday discharged his entire force of waiters, having anticipated a strike, and hired others in their places.

At every police station in the hotel district, the reserves were prepared for a call at any moment, and squad after squad was sent forth to quell disturbances.

Ritz-Carlton Stormed.

In the course of the disorder, 200 striking waiters stormed the Ritz-Carlton hotel and swung one of the big revolving doors from its socket in their rush. Others, from vantage points outside, threw stones and succeeded in breaking windows as high as the sixth floor in the Carlton house apartments, where Police Commissioner Waldo has rooms.

During the attack several pistol shots were fired, by which side in the scrimmage was not apparent at the moment. As a result of the disturbance under his window Commissioner Waldo personally summoned police reserves from the nearest station house.

Some of the hotel and restaurant managers, alarmed at the trend of the night's events, said they anticipated asking Sheriff Harburger to call out his 1,600 deputies to put down the disturbers. The more agitated among them added that they were considering a call on Governor Sulzer for protection through the militia. It was considered by most of those chiefly concerned, however, that the police were amply able to cope with the situation.

Sheriff Harburger said that he would call his deputies out if it was found necessary and he was called upon to do so.

Among the strikers were 300 waiters and other employes at the new Hotel McAlpin. The diningroom force at the Twenty-third street branch of the Y. M. C. A. also joined the strike.

One Case Cited.

Among many persons hurt during outbreaks was Dominick Leonora, a cook said to be on strike. Leonora was attacked near strike headquarters and left lying in the gutter. His skull was fractured and he was taken in a serious condition to a hospital.

Several hundred strikers attacked two non-union waiters outside the Hotel Astor and seriously injured them before police dispersed the mob. Three men were arrested.

The strikers marched to Shanley's restaurant making a demonstration. Another battle with the police in which 400 strikers were involved, ensued. Some of the strikers carried railroad spikes. A detective and several strikers were injured. The police arrested nine men while quelling this riot.

The hotel workers union made its declaration of war in a statement reciting the strikers demands and declaring that unless they are satisfied 20,000 employes will quit work within three days.

$50,000 Theft Charged.

New York, Jan. 23.—As they stepped off a train at the Pennsylvania station four miners were arrested on a charge of stealing gold dust and nuggets worth more than $50,000 from mines at Leadville, Col. Detectives who made the arrest said they found the nuggets and dust strapped around the men in money belts.

120,000 Residents to Be Evicted.

Paris, Jan. 24. — The formidable problem of finding accommodation for 120,000 people who are to be evicted from their dwellings owing to the sale of the antiquated fortifications of Paris to city authorities by the French government is now before the municipal council for solution. The space occupied by the twenty-one-mile wall encircling Paris and the "firing zone," 500 yards in width, facing it, are to be converted into public parks. This space is now covered by many thousand ramshackle houses.

"From your druggist get one ounce of Toris compound (in original sealed package) and one ounce of syrup of Sarsaparilla compound. Take these two ingredients home and put them into a half pint of good whiskey. Shake the bottle and take a tablespoonful before each meal and at bedtime." This is said to be the quickest and best remedy known to the medical profession for rheumatism and backache. Good results come after the first dose. If your druggist does not have Toris compound in stock he will get it for you in a few hours from his wholesale house. Don't be influenced to take a patent medicine instead of this. LIFE'S STRUGGLE WITH ILLNESS

Mrs. Stewart Tells How She Suffered from 16 to 45 years old—How Finally Cured.

Euphemia, Ohio.—"Because of total ignorance of how to care for myself when verging into womanhood, and from taking cold when going to school, I suffered from a displacement, and each month I had severe pains and nausea which always meant a lay-off from work for two to four days from the time I was 16 years old.

"I went to Kansas to live with my sister and while there a doctor told me of the Pinkham remedies but I did not use them then as my faith in patent medicines was limited. After my sister died I came home to Ohio to live and that has been my home for the last 18 years.

"The Change of Life came when I was 47 years old and about this time I saw my physical condition plainly described in one of your advertisements. Then I began using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I cannot tell you or any one the relief it gave me in the first three months. It put me right where I need not lay off every month and during the last 18 years I have not paid out two dollars to a doctor, and have been blest with excellent health for a woman of my age and I can thank Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for it.

"Since the Change of Life is over I have been a maternity nurse and being wholly self-supporting I cannot over estimate the value of good health. I have now earned a comfortable little home just by sewing and nursing since I was 52 years old. I have recommended the Compound to many with good results, as it is excellent to take before and after childbirth."—Miss EVELYN ADELIA STEWART, Euphemia, Ohio.

STUDIES A GREAT PROBLEM

BUREAU OF SOCIAL HYGIENE IS EXPLAINED.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Tells of Its Origin, Work and Plans for the Investigation of Vice Conditions.

New York, Jan. 27.—In order that the public might better understand the Bureau of Social Hygiene, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., today gave out a statement explaining the origin, work and plans of that institution. The bureau, he said, came into existence about two years ago as a result of the work of a special grand jury appointed to investigate the white slave traffic in New York City. This jury recommended that a public commission be appointed to study the social evil.

Mr. Rockefeller was foreman of that grand jury and he thereafter gave the subject deep thought and conferred with a large number of leading men and women. "These conferences," says Mr. Rockefeller, "developed the feeling that a public commission would labor under a number of disadvantages, such as the fact that it would be short lived; that its work would be done publicly; that at best it could hardly do more than present recommendations. So the conviction grew that in order to make a real and lasting improvement in conditions, a permanent organization should be created, the continuation of which would not be dependent upon a temporary wave of reform, nor upon the life of any man or group of men, but which would go on, generation after generation, continuously making warfare against the forces of evil. It also appeared that a private organization would have, among other advantages, a certain freedom from publicity and from political bias, which a publicly appointed commission could not so easily avoid.

"Therefore, as the initial step, in the winter of 1911 the Bureau of Social Hygiene was formed. Its present members are Miss Katherine Bement Davis, superintendent of the New York State Reformatory for Women at Bedford Hills, N. Y.; Paul M. Warburg, of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; Starr J. Murphy, of the New York bar, and John D. Rockefeller, Jr. As the work develops new members may be added.

"One of the first things undertaken by the bureau was the establishment at Bedford Hills, adjacent to the reformatory, of a laboratory of social hygiene, under Miss Davis' direction. In this laboratory it is proposed to study from the physical, mental, social and moral side each person committed to the reformatory. This study will be carried on by experts and each case will be kept under observation for from three weeks to three months, as may be required. When the diagnosis is completed, it is hoped that the laboratory will be in position to recommend the treatment most likely to reform the individual, or, if reformation is impossible, to recommend permanent custodial care. Furthermore, reaching out beyond the individuals involved, it is believed that thus important contributions may be made to a fuller knowledge of the conditions ultimately responsible for vice. If this experiment is successful the principle may prove applicable to all classes of criminals and the conditions precedent to crime, and lead to lines of action not only more scientific and humane but also less wasteful than those at present followed."

That its work might be done intelligently the bureau employed George J. Kneeland to make a comprehensive survey of vice conditions in New York, and Abraham Flexner to study the social evil in Europe, and their reports are now being prepared. These studies will be followed by others in various American cities, and it is the hope of the bureau that, based upon all of them, may be devised a practical plan for dealing with the social evil.

In conclusion Mr. Rockefeller's statement says: "It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the spirit which dominates the work of the bureau is not sensational or sentimental or hysterical; that it is not a spirit of criticism of public officials; but that it is essentially a spirit of constructive suggestion and of deep scientific as well as humane interest in a great world problem."

Frisco Ferry Boats Collide.

San Francisco, Jan. 27—Ploughing along at halfspeed through a dense fog that veiled San Francisco bay, two Southern Pacific ferry steamers, the Bay City and the Melrose, collided and narrowly escaped sinking. More than 100 passengers and members of the crew were aboard the vessels. The force of the impact carried away large sections of the upper frame work of both ferries.

The cries of the men brought the women and children of the village to the shore, where they stood in terror.

DOINGS OF THE SOLONS

Minnesota Legislative Affairs of the Past Week—Law Makers Hard at Work.

St. Paul, Jan. 27.—Members of the lower house of the Minnesota legislature called certain veterans of the civil war "paper soldiers" and sought to cast suspicion on a bill introduced by R. C. Dunn appropriating $30,000 to defray the expense of sending the Minnesota survivors of the battle of Gettysburg to the battlefield next July to attend the 50th anniversary celebration of that battle. The house then refused to suspend the rules and pass Mr. Dunn's bill. Eighty votes were required to pass the bill. It received 67, with 47 against it.

R. C. Dunn said that it was an insult to the old soldiers of Minnesota which would receive condemnation throughout the state. He paid tribute to the survivors of Gettysburg in one of the most impassioned speeches of the session and asked the members, in respect to them, to pass the measure under suspension of the rules.

Rural Credit Measure.

Members of the legislature believe that if the national banks could loan money on farm lands the Northwest would be developed much quicker than at present. They feel that congress should amend the national banking act so that money could be placed on farm mortgages. A resolution introduced by Senator S. D. Works of Mankato was passed unanimously in the senate. The Minnesota senators and representatives in congress are asked to do all in their power to pass the proposed amendment.

Tonnage Tax Up Tuesday.

The fight over the tonnage tax will open in the house Tuesday when the bill will be first considered by the tax committee.

At that time Representatives Bjorge and Frankson, authors of the bill, will argue for its passage. A second meeting will be held Friday night, when a delegation from the Cuyuna range will argue against it. A third meeting the week following will be given to opposition from the Missabe range.

A Bull Moose Bill.

The Bull Moose bill, amending the state election laws so as to give the third party an equal standing with the Democratic and Republican parties at the next election, will be introduced in the senate by Ole Sageng and in the house by Thomas Frankson. Bull Moose supporters in Minnesota have been looking forward to the passage of the bill without opposition.

Should Not Have Been Paid.

The attorney general has given an opinion in which he concludes that the publication of the state treasurer's report made this year in the Volks-Zeitung, a St. Paul German daily paper, of which there has been some criticism, is not sufficiently in detail to comply with the terms of the constitution and that the bill therefore should not have been paid.

The return by old members of revised statutes purchased for their use two years ago is demanded in a resolution offered by one of the new members. The resolution carried on division.

On motion of Rep. Kerry Conley, it was decided to mail the senate and house journals to all public libraries.

St. Paul, Jan. 25.—The House yesterday, by unanimous vote, acceded to the request of the Senate that the Moonan resolution, asking for a joint committee to work out a plan for reorganization of state departments, be recalled from the committee and returned.

Initiative and Referendum.

Initiative and Referendum will be Amendment No. 1 on the ballot at the election a year from next autumn, if the House committee on elections has its way. The judiciary committee would like to have this coveted position taken by the amendment providing for an increase to seven in the justices of the Supreme Court. This amendment will be reported today.

State Board Included.

State boards which collect fees for holding examinations, as the board of medical examiners, the board of pharmacy and the board of dental examiners, are to be included in the investigation of state departments being conducted by the House committee on public accounts and expenditures.

Representative S. R. Childs, chairman of the committee, learned today that the boards are allowed by law in most instances to keep fees for their own expenses. This is wrong, he declared, and all fees will be turned into the state treasury. Expense money should be drawn from the treasury by warrant signed by the state auditor and the state treasurer, says the chairman.

Would Classify Property.

L. C. Spooner of Morris, who advocated classification of real and personal property for taxation purposes during his gubernatorial campaign, today introduced a bill in the House embodying his ideas. The Spooner bill divides real and personal properties into seven different classes.

St. Paul, Jan. 24.—Charges of flagrant violations of the corrupt practices act and that ballot boxes were tampered with, were made by R. B. Brower of St. Cloud before the house elections committee in defense of Joseph H. Coates whose seat in the lower house is being contested by C. A. Gilman.

Clash In House.

A clash between H. H. Dunn, former Speaker, and W. I. Nolan, chairman of the House rules committee, in debate over the Lundeen bill for a committee on committees, was the sensation of the Legislature. Trouble was averted when Dunn retracted his remarks.

The report of the elections committee that Lundeen's bill be indefinitely postponed, started the debate. Lundeen moved that the bill be on general orders, and charged Nolan and other Rines men, who supported the committee on committee plan two years ago, with attempting "to strangle the infant of their own brain."

Dunn Enters the Debate.

Replying to Nolan's statement that the Lundeen bill would turn control of the House over to a minority, former Speaker Dunn said:

"I don't like to see any one member arrogate to himself all the tissue paper sweetness of progressivism. I too, claim to be a Progressive. But I am not of that type of Progressive who preaches temperance and virtue from behind a red nose or a shady path."

Nolan Demands Apology.

Before Dunn settled back in his seat Nolan was on his feet.

"Mr. Speaker," he shouted, "I rise to a question of personal privilege. I demand that before we proceed the member from Freeborn apologize and that his remarks be expunged."

St. Paul, Jan. 23.—Without a dissenting vote Knute Nelson was re-elected United States senator by both branches of the legislature, and his re-election ratified by the two legislative branches in joint session.

A tentative reapportionment scheme has been worked out by the house committee. The number of senators and house members to be allowed each congressional district has been calculated. The sub-committeeman from the various districts were notified yesterday of the number that would be permitted given to their districts and were instructed to confer with the senators from their districts.

Under the tentative plan there are to be 63 senators and 126 representatives.

The lower house of the state legislature has ordered an investigation of the methods of every company engaged in buying and selling grain and live stock in Minnesota, and of the state grain inspection department.

The resolution, offered by C. M. Bendixen, was forecast last week.

In both house and senate bills were introduced designed for the protection of working men. In the house a series of measures designed to accomplish this purpose was presented by the labor committee. In the senate Messrs. Wilson and Gunderson fathered the workmen's compensation bill prepared by the state bar association.

St. Paul, Jan. 22.—The house committee on public accounts and expenditures introduced a resolution today asking that all state departments submit an account of every dollar appropriation allowed them by the state legislature two years ago.

The committee action was taken at the suggestion of L. C. Spooner of Morris, who charged that there was criminal extravagance on the part of state officials and state employes.

The move is in line with the recommendations of Governor Eberhart in his message to the legislature.

A 2-cent fare bill, based on the earnings of the railroads, has been introduced into the lower house of the Minnesota legislature by C. M. Bendixen of Wells. The bill provides that where railroads earn $1,200 or more a mile they shall not charge more than 2 cents. The measure has taken the roads' earnings for 1911 as a basis and as all Minnesota railroads earn more than $1,200 a mile, the bill, if passed, will practically establish a uniform rate of 2 cents a mile.

Wheaton Club Elects Officers.

Wheaton.—At the annual meeting of the Commercial club the following officers were elected: President, F. H. Klawon; vice president, Martin Williams; secretary, Victor E. Anderson; treasurer, G. K. Kristenson; directors, Andrew Peterson, J. T. Erickson, Lars Rakke and John A. Hammond. The report of the secretary showed a membership of 127, and $500 in the treasury.

Board Elects Vice President.

New York, Jan. 25.—H. R. Williams has been elected a vice president, director and member of the executive committee of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railway. Formerly he was president of the Puget Sound division. Mr. Williams, with headquarters here, will be in charge of the company's finances to that extent succeeding the late Roswell Miller, who was chairman of the board. The other duties of the latter position have been combined with those of the president.

N. Y. Senate Favors Women.

Albany, N. Y., Jan. 25.—In obedience to party platform pledges, the senate voted to submit to the voters of New York state a proposed constitutional amendment permitting women to vote. The senate resolution differs from the one passed by the assembly last Monday in that it would require a citizen by marriage to have been a resident of the United States for five years. The assembly leaders have given their word to the suffragists that the house will concur.

Wedding Rings That Wear.

The next time you are married—or, if you will, when you are married—don't buy a gold wedding ring. It isn't being done. Platinum wedding rings are the newest thing. Mlle Jeanne Provost, a French actress, is to blame. She thought of the idea, and when she was married to M. Firpo, she had one. Platinum rings are more expensive than gold and wear better. Just why an actress, especially a French actress, should want a wedding ring that will last a long while, the jewelers haven't learned.

Men are like trees; they grow either crooked or straight.

His Childish Wish.

Here is an excerpt from Paul West's "Just Boy" letters, which reads like a clipping from the "Little Johnny" papers by Ambrose Bierce in the early volumes of the Argonaut: "I ast my father why ministers move so much and he said he guessed they was forced to on account of thare sons. I wisht my father was a minister."—San Francisco Argonaut.

Neat Differentiation.

Senator Lodge, at a dinner in the Back Bay district of Boston indicated very neatly the difference between a statesman and a politician.

"A statesman," he said, "thinks of the next generation; a politician of the next election."

Have You a Disordered Stomach and Liver?

Do you start the day feeling that the whole world is against you? You cannot hope to "make good" under these circumstances. Nobody can. You must have a clear brain and every organ in perfect trim to do justice to yourself.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

Will Bring Quick Relief

Dr. R. V. Pierce found years ago that a glyceric extract of Golden Seal and Oregon grape roots, queen's root and bloodroot with black cherry bark, would aid in the assimilation of the food in the stomach, correct liver ills and in nature's own way enrich the blood, tone the entire system and consequently help in the restoration of perfect health. Many who have used Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery testify that they have been restored to health when suffering from stomach and liver ills. Let this famous old medicine start today to lead you to health and strength.

Now—if you prefer—you can obtain Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription tablets of your druggist at $1 per box, also in 50c size or send 50 one-cent stamps to R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, for a trial box.

You can learn all about hygiene, anatomy, medicine, etc., from the People's Common Sense Medical Adviser, by Dr. R. V. Pierce, a newly revised, up-to-date edition of which is now offered, in cloth covers, post-paid, for 31 cents in one-cent stamps, to cover cost of wrapping and mailing only. Address, Dr. Pierce's Invalids Hotel, Buffalo, N. Y.

Don't be poisoned by sluggish bowels. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets regulate and invigorate stomach, liver and bowels. Sugar coated, tiny granules.

The Best Physicians Gave Him Up

"I was attacked with a severe nervous disease, which was caused by a disordered stomach and liver," writes Mr. Jas. D. Lively, of Washburn, Tenn., Route 2, Box 8. "All my friends thought I would die and the best physicians gave me up. I was advised to try Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and derived much benefit from same. My case had run so long, it had become so chronic, that nothing would effect a permanent cure, but Dr. Pierce's medicine has done much for me, and I highly recommend it. I heartily advise its use as a spring tonic and further advise ailing people to take Dr. Pierce's medicines before their diseases have run so long that there is no chance to be cured."

Entered as second-class matter Sept. 22, 1911, at the post office at Holt, Minnesota, under the act of March 3, 1879.

Who can tell us why we get no decision on the Minnesota rate cases from the United States Supreme Court?

It looks as though Paul Marschalk was making good in the legislature. He has introduced a number of good bills up to the present time and we hope he may be able to get most of them enacted into laws. A live man in the legislature can do a whole lot to boost his home territory, and Paul seems to be a live one.

A bill has been introduced in the senate which, if enacted into law, will do away with the milenge book system, and force every passenger on the trains in the state to pay precisely the same rate of mileage, whether they be rich or poor. We do not think the bill will be passed. If it it, it will be taken into the courts, and hang up indefinetely, same as the Sanborn decision which knocked out the 2-cents per mile law.

It is possible that the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country may be attacked by the government under the Sherman anti-trust law as being combinations in restraint of trade and regulation, or control, of prices. We have always been somewhat puzzled as to just what benefit the producer received from the Chamber of Commerce methods of market manipulation, and we hope that the government may take action that will definitely establish the good or evil of such organizations.

The woman's suffrage bill was defeated in the state senate on Tuesday by a vote of 33 to 30. Inasmuch as this measure provided for submitting the question to the people as a constitutional amendment, we fail to see why any senator should vote against it. We believe it is clearly the duty of any legislator to do his best to have such questions submitted to popular vote. The legislator who votes against such procedure assumes the role of a censor over his constituents instead of being their representative. If this is to be a government by the people, then it is unquestionably the right of the people to vote on just such questions. It is to be hoped that the measure may be brought up again before the session closes, and we believe the result may be different.

HOW JERUSALEM IS RULED

Municipality Composed of Ten Members, of Whom the President Alone Receives a Salary.

The Jerusalem municipality is composed of ten members, half of whom are chosen every two years, the term of office being four years. From these ten the governor of the province of Jerusalem chooses one to be the president or mayor. The president is the only member receiving a salary, which is about $64 a month.

The members of the municipal council or commission are chosen by the whole city, but are apportioned in accordance with the different races and religions. Their duties are largely advisory, the president exercising most of the power. All property owners who are Ottoman subjects have a right to vote for the commissioners.

The municipality does not concern itself with schools, courts, police, etc. (these are provided by the government of the province of Jerusalem); its principal functions are the care, repair, lighting and cleaning of the streets; sanitary and quarantine inspection and oversight, including the public slaughter house; the maintenance of a petroleum storage warehouse and a municipal hospital and other charitable institutions; market regulations, etc.

As the total budget is under $50,000 for a city of about 80,000, it will be seen that the provincial government handles most of the more important departments.

JUST WHAT HORSE-POWER IS

Meaning of the Term Illustrated by Its Application to Power Used by Big Lines.

The average man is apt to speak very glibly of so many hundred or thousand horsepower, but it is extremely doubtful whether one person in a hundred has a due appreciation of what the phrase really means.

Calculating the strength of twelve men to be equal to one horsepower, it would require 840,000 men to produce as much energy as the 70,000 horsepower developed by the turbine machinery of a big Atlantic steamship. Then, if the men were to work on the eight-hour-day system, those figures would give a total of 2,250,000, that being the number of men whose strength would be necessary to drive the vessel across the Atlantic ocean.—Harper's Weekly.

SHRUNKEN EGGS.

A perfectly fresh egg, one that has just been dropped and is still warm, entirely fills its shell. As it cools to the temperature of the air it contracts a little, leaving a small space at the large end of the egg empty. As the egg ages this space increases in size, due to the escape of moisture from the egg through its shell. When the air space becomes quite enlarged, perhaps to almost half the shell, the egg is known as shrunken; it has lost its flavor, is stale and unfit to eat. There are many stages of staleness between a perfectly fresh and a rotten egg, but a shrunken one is the limit of eatableness.

KILLS SELF AND PET CAT.

With his pet white cat dead near him, William Allen, a salesman, forty-five years old, was found dead in the kitchen of his home at Williamsburg, N. Y. Both he and the cat had been suffocated by illuminating gas, which was escaping from two open gas jets. It was evidently a case of suicide, as Allen had been worried over the critical condition of his wife, who is a patient in the hospital without hope of recovery.

Gunderson Was Mistaken

John Gunderson, the Saskatchewan seer, got a wrong hunch concerning the disappearance of Albert Narum, who was missing for about three weeks from his home southeast of Thief River Falls.

Some four weeks ago Narum was at Thief River Falls one day and did not return home. His family began inquiries, but the best of the local sleuths could find no clue as to his whereabouts. Then someone who had read of Gunderson's success in locating the Gronwald money, as we recently told of, wrote to him asking his assistance in locating Narum. Gunderson's reply arrived Saturday and created a real sensation. He stated that Narum had been killed by another man, the weapon used being a new axe handle, and that the body had been hidden at a certain place, described by certain land marks, and shown by a rough map enclosed with the letter. Sunday and Monday the searchers were out in force, but, while they found the land marks about as described, there was no dead body. On Tuesday the supposed-to-be-dead Narum returned from Minneapolis, where he had been travelling at a pace that left him no time to notify the people at home.

Concerning Taxes

Anyone who has taxes to pay should remember the following very important things:

No notices are sent out concerning the real estate taxes. They are due January 1st, and at least one-half must be paid by May 31st; the other half may be left unpaid until October 31st. If no payment be made by May 31st, a penalty of ten per cent is added. If you write the county treasurer for a statement of real estate taxes, or send in money to pay them, always give the legal description of the real estate in full. These taxes are listed by their description and not by names of the owners, and in many instances mistakes can hardly be avoided unless you give the legal description of the property.

Notices are sent out for personal property taxes. They are due January 1st, and, if not paid by March 1 a penalty of 10 per cent is added. If not paid by April 1, they will be collected dy the sheriff.

Cut this out and keep it for reference. It may save you money.

GET POISON FROM THE SOIL

Grasses in Some Parts of Africa Cause Various Destructive Diseases Among Cattle.

Africa labors under many diseases of a devastating kind, and the presidential address by Dr. Arnold Theiles to the South African association drew up a rather appalling summary of the diseases of malaria, sleeping sickness, horse sickness, and ostrich sickness, among others. But he added another not so well known —the disease of "Lamziekte" among cattle, which has caused terrible destruction, and even threatened to ruin the newly developed northwestern districts. The investigations carried out by Mr. Burtt Davy, the government botanist, show that the cause is probably the poisons which are present in grasses of certain areas. The theory is that grasses on certain soils and under certain climatic conditions develop a poison of accumulative character, which only shows its effects in cattle after they have partaken of such grasses for a prolonged period. As an instance, the plant Senesio latifolia at Grahamstown proved fatal to horses and cattle. The experiments in Natal with the same plant showed that it was harmless to horses and cattle there.—London Morning Post.

Creamery Earned Big Sum

At the annual meeting of creamery stockholders the following officers for the ensuing year were elected:

Directors—Louis Weggo, Theo. Sorum, R. L. Olson,

Secretary—T. B. Folden,

Treasurer—Nils Engebretsen.

Mr. Olson did not qualify as director and Ole Reiersn was appointed in his place and chosen as president.

The receipts for 1912 footed up to the neat total of $21,740.89, and we will give the complete annual report in our next issue.

It is now a little more than five yeers since this creamery commenced business, and the following figures show the total business for that time:

Total cream received	1,355,247 lbs
Total butter made	437,437 "
Total cash received	$118,776.44

These figures show the immense value of this industry to the community, and with the united support of the farmers it will soon double its present value. Stick to your home creamery; it will repay you well.

WORKS BILL PASSES

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT SECURES ONE VOTE MORE THAN IS NECESSARY.

SIX YEAR PRESIDENTIAL TERM

House and Thirty-six States Must Ratify it First, However—Bill May Affect Wilson—Attempts to Alter.

Washington, Feb. 3.—By a vote of forty-seven to twenty-three, just one more than the required two-thirds majority, the senate late Saturday passed the resolution introduced by Senator John D. Works of California, which would so amend the constiution as to fix the presidential tenure of office at six years instead of four. The constitutional amendment, which must be ratified by the house of representatives and three-fourths of the states, also provides that any person elected to the office is ineligible for re-election.

May Extend Wilson's Term.

If the measure is approved in the lower legislative chamber and ratified by the states within the next four years, it is possible that it will automatically extend the four-year term to which Governor Wilson was elected last November to March 4, 1919.

Works' resolution contemplates substitution of the following in lieu of the first paragraph of section I, article II, of the constitution:

> "The executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. The term of the office of the president shall be six years and no person who has held the office by election or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as president under the constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.
>
> "The president, together with a vice president, chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows:

Here the language of the constitution is resumed.

The Vice Presidency.

The proposed constitutional amendment would not affect the vice presidency except to lengthen the term to six years. There would be no prohibition against re-election of the president's running mate. Several senators were uncertain, however, whether, in case a vice president succeeds to the chief magistracy, he could again be elected to the presidency. Senator Cummins of Iowa, who reported the Works' resolution, however, held it was plain that if a vice president held the presidential office even for a short time, it would make him eligible, under the proposed amendment, to assume the presidency for another trem.

Probably never before in the history of the senate did a single measure provide such a fertile field for authority. Saturday's discussion ranged from the rise and fall of the Roman empire, through the reign of the Napoleons in France and the revolutionary days in America up to and including the issue of new nationalism of today.

It precipitated a lengthy wrangle between Senators Cummins of Iowa and Poindexter of Washington, wherein the latter predicted the ultimate dissolution of the republican and democratic parties, and the forming of two new political organizations—progressives of both old parties arranged against the reactionaries of both old parties. Cummins could not agree.

The debate between these two led Senator Williams of Mississippi, bitterly to denounce Roosevelt and the new nationalism. He characterized the bull moose leader as "the knight of the twentieth century with the political theories of Alexander Hamilton," but nevertheless opposed any amendment to the Works resolution which might specificially prohibit Roosevelt's re-election, declaring that the six-year term would certainly be rejected by the states, if such a provision were included.

Following Williams' speech, the senate rejected Senator Hitchcock's amendment, fixing March 3, 1917, as the time when the six-year term and no re-election provision shall become effective.

Senator Sutherland's plan to fix the term for president in office at the time of final ratification of the constitutional amendment at four years was then rejected: 27 to 38.

Havanna, Feb. 4.—An explosion in a hardware store at Cienfugos Saturday resulted in the death of 10 persons, including the proprietor and his wife and their children. The others killed were persons in the immediate community, where scores also were injured. It is believed that the explosion was due to combusition of a large quantity of blasting powder which was kept for sale.

TENTATIVE TARIFF FRAMING ON

DEMOCRATS FACE PROBLEM IN MAKING UP OF REVENUE.

Expected That Work Will Be Finished By Middle of March.

Washington, Feb. 3.—The framing of the tentative basis of the entire tariff legislation of the coming extra session of congress began today in the house committee on ways and means.

The 14 Democrats of the committee consitiute its majority and they are meeting in executive session daily until they have revised the 14 schedules of the present law and the free list and administrative provision as well.

Democratic Leader Underwood believes the committee will be able to finish its work by the middle of March.

Upon the committee's progress will depend the date of the extra session of congress. In the first week of that session the house Democrats in caucus will determine whether the revision shall be schedule by schedule or by a single sweeping measure.

The committee is confronted with the problem of raising from $325,000,000 to $350,000,000 from customs duties, coupled with a pledge of lowering the tariff bars on necessities. Of this total figure, the plan is to provide between $85,000,000 and $100,000,000 by an income tax. The income tax in turn, would embrace the corporation tax, which bids fair to yield $30,000,000 revenue during the year.

A fairly well determined program is already indicated. In the main, according to the Democrats, the chemical, iron and steel, wool, cotton and free list bills will be like the previous ones, but there will be numerous changes dictated by new light thrown on individual articles.

The Democratic majority already is strongly committed to an income tax and its partial offset, the free sugar plans.

It is estimated that free sugar would deplete revenues by $53,000,000 and that the free list would cut out approximately $17,000,000 more. There will be reductions in the cotton, wool and other schedules, that may cause a material loss, though in some of the cases the Democrats count upon increased importations to offset the cut in duties.

A DOUBLE MURDER

Farm Hand Held for Crime Near Sparta, Says Robbery Was Motive.

Sparta, Wis., Feb. 4.—The murder last Thursday of August Harmon and his wife, an aged couple, who lived on a farm near here, is solved. A Volt Rentz, a farm hand, under arrest in connection with the killing, has confessed to the crime.

He confessed how he shot the farmer with a 22 calibre rifle as Harmon was doing his chores and then shot Mrs. Harmon, who was at work in the kitchen. He rested the weapon on the window sill and fired at her as she was washing dishes. Rentz confessed to the sheriff and district attorney. He will be held to await the coroner's verdict.

Robbery, Rentz said, was the motive for the crime. He got $115, the savings of the aged couple, found hidden in the house. Rentz borrowed the rifle with which the deed was committed and his first act after the murder was to return the borrowed weapon and pay for its use.

Slung Shot Is Official Weapon.

London, Feb. 3.—The British suffragists have adopted the slung shot as a weapon. With it they hurl heavy leaden disks stamped "votes for women." Their aim has not been good and the damage thus far has not been great. The disc is said to be capable of killing a man. An actress named Jaky Metford was charged in police court this morning with bombarding shop windows with one of these catapults used from the top of an omnibus.

CASTRO IS ADMITTED

NEW YORK JUDGE AGREES ON POSTPONEMENT OF VENEZUELAN'S CASE.

TAKES VERY FINE SUITE.

Scarcely Glances Out of the Window as He Spins up Broadway, but Talks Voluably—Goes to Bed.

New York, Feb. 3.—The right to go and come, a free man, through the streets of New York was Friday night the possession of Gen. Cipriano Castro, but instead of exercising the privilege he went to bed. Released under $500 bail, pending argument on a writ of habeas corpus, after his month of confinement at Ellis Island, Castro made for an uptown hotel, engaged a luxurious suite of rooms, and shut himself up. He sent out word that he was "having some lemonade" and intended to retire immediately.

Scarcely Looked Out.

The little general, whose announced purpose in coming to this country was to "see the sights," scarcely looked out of the window of the taxicab which drove him to his hotel. The only object of interest he noticed was the Washington arch. "May George Washington's mantle descend upon us," said Castro in Spanish as his cab whizzed under the arch.

General Castro's week of freedom was granted by Judge Holt after it had been agreed to postpone argument on the writ until Feb. 7. The document compels the government to show legal cause why Castro, was ordered deported Thursday by Secretary Nagel of the department of commerce and labor, should not be admitted.

Calls it Justice.

"Justice has prevailed," Castro said when he was told that Judge Holt would release him on bail. "I was looking for a real judge who would give me justice and at last I found one."

The little general was at once surrounded by a group of friends, including Antonio Jose Sanchez, his former secretary. Castro himself would say nothing of the killing of Paredes, for which he is held responsible by the immigration authorities, but Sanchez said that Castro was "in a dying condition" when the order was given that Paredes be put to death and "could have known nothing of it."

Smiles Wreath Face.

With his smiles wreathing his bearded face, the general, attired in a fur coat, silk hat and doeskin gloves, posed for photographers as soon as he reached Broadway a free man. Then he entered a taxicab. On his ride to the hotel Castro, through an interpreter, chattered to a reporter the entire journey.

"This is an event upon which I can congratulate myself," he said. "Some people tried to sow discord between this country and Venezuela, but they have failed. When the Latin-American republic learn that I have found a just judge in the United States it will be a matter of satisfaction to every one of them. This event has established a new bond of union between North and South America."

Iowan With $7,000 Lost in Chicago.

Chicago, Feb. 1.—Police have begun search for Fred Hanselman, a bakery owner of Oelwein, Ia., who came here about Jan. 17 with $7,000 to establish himself in business. His wife fears he has met with violence.

Offer to Furnish Germany Oil.

Berlin, Feb. 3.—A deputation of Americans representing the independent petroleum interests, headed by C. D. Chamberlain of Cleveland, appeared before the committee of the Imperial Parliament to which the German government's petroleum monopoly bill has been referred. They assured the committee that the independent producers were prepared to supply Germany's entire needs if the German government would furnish tank steamers. The Americans submitted to exhaustive questioning.

INCOME TAX IN CONSTITUTION

LAST NECESSARY STATE PASSES THE BILL.

New Mexico, Thirty-Sixth Commonwealth, Ratifies the Amendment.

Washington, Feb. 3. — Official machinery to add an amendment to the constitution for an income tax has now been put in motion. News of certain ratifications by New Mexico of the amendment spurred officials to action. New Mexico's will be the final state vote necessary to insure the amendment's adoption.

So certain were income tax advocates at the capital of success that preparations were made to put the amendment into effect. Democratic leaders proposed enactment of an income tax bill as the early achievement of the Wilson administration. Passage of such a bill will not be attempted at this session of congress, but will almost certainly be passed early in the extra session.

Santa Fe., N. M.—By noon enough states had approved the federal income tax amendment to make it effective as soon as the secretary of state has officially announced its ratification.

Late Saturday the New Mexico senate indorsed the amendment by a vote of 19 to 1. The resolution of indorsement was reported favorably by the judiciary committee and a vote was taken without any preliminary discussion.

WATER OWNER QUESTION

Right of Government Control and Tax Will be Settled This Week.

Washington, Feb. 4.—The question of federal control of water powers and power sites, upon which conservation forces have centered much of their fight during the last few years will be brought before the senate this week, when efforts will be made to pass the first bill establishing the government's right to license, control and tax a water power constructed in a navigable river.

While the bill in question involves only the rights of a power company at Windsor Mills, Conn., the controversy over the measure has become so keen that conservation forces are lining up behind it and will endeavor to force its passage through the senate.

Colonel Roosevelt, near the end of his term, vetoed two bills which did not contain this recognition of federal control, and the pending measure is the first in which such a provision has been incorporated.

President Taft's administration, and Secretary of War Stimson, are behind the idea of federal control as now embodied in the bill.

Denies He Has Chosen Bryan.

Philadelphia, Feb. 3.—"There is no justification for the inference that William J. Bryan is to be secretary of state and that I sent him a message by Colonel House." This was the statement here of President-elect Wilson. The governor came to Philadelphia for a visit to his dentist, commenting on reports which have been current.

Presbyterian Divine Dies.

New York, Feb. 3.—William Henry Hubbard, D. D., of Auburn, N. Y., executive secretary of the executive commission of the Presbyterian church in the United States and long prominent in the affairs of the denomination, died in this city of pneumonia, complicated with heart trouble.

London Suffragists Not Downcast.

London, Feb. 1.—Mrs. Emmiline Pankhurst, in a speech at a meeting of the women's Social and Political union, said that the militant suffragists are determined to carry on the fight with increasing effective methods until the vote was granted to women. They were compelled to strike the enemy, the government, through other people, but she explained that was always necessary in revolutionary warfare. Whatever was done she would take the responsibility.

St. Vitus' dance makes children awkward at first, then restless; later comes the twitching of the muscles and jerking of the limbs and body.

At the first sign of nervousness, inability to sit still, sleeplessness or continued irritability give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, one after each meal. The change will soon be apparent. As the thin blood becomes rich and red, the starved nerves get the needed nourishment and the alarming symptoms vanish. There is no danger of St. Vitus unless the blood is thin.

WHY THE MEAL WAS HALTED

Nothing Seriously Wrong, but Old Gentleman Had Some Trouble With the Elusive Onion.

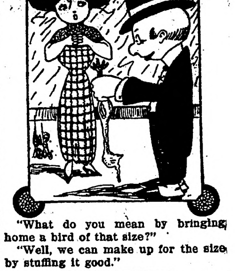
An aged country couple, on the urgent invitation of a grandson who lived in the city, were on for a visit. The grandson's wife was very anxious that the first meal should be one which the aged couple would enjoy after their long ride in the train, and accordingly the table groaned under its burden of good things to eat.

In the course of the repast she noticed several times that the old man seemed to be making little progress with the meal.

"What is the matter, grandfather?" she asked, "don't you like my dinner?"

"No, no, granddaughter," mumbled the old man, "it isn't that. Only I've a pickled onion in my mouth, and I hain't got but one tooth left, so it's harder'n Sam Hill to catch it, it's so lively. Just rest easy a spell till I git a holt on it and I'll be all right!"

SURE.



"What do you mean by bringing home a bird of that size?"

"Well, we can make up for the size by stuffing it good."

It takes more than a soft answer to turn away the book agent.

COFFEE THRESHED HER.
15 Long Years.

"For over fifteen years," writes a patient, hopeful little Ills. woman, "while a coffee drinker, I suffered from Spinal Irritation and Nervous trouble. I was treated by good physicians, but did not get much relief.

"I never suspected that coffee might be aggravating by condition. (Tea is just as injurious, because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.) I was down-hearted and discouraged, but prayed daily that I might find something to help me.

"Several years ago, while at a friend's house I drank a cup of Postum and though I had never tasted anything more delicious.

"From that time on I used Postum instead of coffee and soon began to improve in health, so that now I can walk half a dozen blocks or more with ease, and do many other things that I never thought I would be able to do again in this world.

"My appetite is good, I sleep well and find life is worth living. A lady of my acquaintance said she did not like Postum, it was so weak and tasteless.

"I explained to her the difference when it is made right—boiled according to directions. She was glad to know this because coffee did not agree with her. Now her folks say they expect to use Postum the rest of their lives." Name given upon request. Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

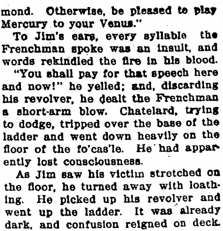
The STOLEN SINGER



by MARTHA BELLINGER

COPYRIGHT 1911 THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

Agatha Redmond, opera singer, starting for an auto drive in New York, finds a stranger sent as her chauffeur. Leaving the car, she goes into the park to read the will of an old friend of her mother, who has left her property. There she is accosted by a stranger, who follows her to the auto, climbs in and chloroforms her. James Hambleton of Lynn, Mass., witnesses the abduction of Agatha Redmond. Hambleton sees Agatha forcibly taken aboard a yacht. He secures a tug and when near the yacht drops overboard. Aleck Van Camp, friend of Hambleton, had an appointment with him. Not meeting Hambleton, he makes a call upon friends, Madame and Miss Melanie Reynier. He proposes to the latter and is refused. Melanie explains that she is of high birth in a German principality, from which she had fled to escape an unwished marriage.

CHAPTER V.—Continued.

"I shall not do this again, Melanie dear, till you give me leave. But I have no mind to let you go, either. You and Madame Reynier are going on a cruise with me; will you? Get your maid to pack your grip. It will be better for you than the 'professional advice' which you came to New York for." Aleck stopped suddenly, his practical sense coming to the surface. "Heavens! You haven't had any lunch, and it's all times of the day!" He rang the bell, begged the maid to fetch bread and butter and tea and to ask Madame Reynier to come to the drawing-room. When she appeared, he met her with a grave, but in no wise a cowed, spirit.

"Madame Reynier, your niece refuses, for the present, to consider herself engaged to me; I, however, am unequivocally betrothed to her. And I shall be endlessly grateful if you and Miss Reynier will be my guests on the Sea Gull for as long a time as you find it diverting. We shall cruise along the coast and put into harbor at night, if it seems best; and I'll try to make you comfortable. Will you come?"

Madame Reynier was willing if Melanie was; and Melanie had no strength, if she had the will, to combat Aleck's masterful ways. It was soon settled. Aleck swung off down the street, re-reading Jim's letter, intent only on the Sea Gull and the preparations for his guests. But at the back of his mind he was thinking, "Poor girl! She needs me more than I thought!"

CHAPTER VI.

On Board the Jeanne D'Arc.

If hard usage and obstacles could cure a knight-errant of his sentiment, then Jimmy Hambleton had been free of his passion for the Face. His plunge overboard had been followed by a joyous swim, a lusty call to the yacht for "Help," and a growing amazement when he realized that it was the yacht's intention to pass him by. He had swum valiantly, determined to get picked up by that particular craft, when suddenly his strength failed. He remembered thinking that it was all up with him, and then he lost consciousness.

When he awoke he was on a hard bunk in a dim place, and a sailor was jerking him about. His throat burned with a fiery liquid. Then he felt the plunging and rising of the boat, and came to life sufficiently to utter the stereotyped words, "Where am I?"

In Jim's case the question did not imply the confused groping back to sense that it usually indicates, but rather an actual desire to know whether or not he was on board the Jeanne D'Arc. Plainly his wits had not been badly shattered by his experience overboard. But the sailor who was attending him with such ministrations as he understood, answered him with a sample of French which Jim had never met with in his schoolbooks, and he was not enlightened for some hours.

It was indeed the Jeanne D'Arc, as Jim proved for himself the next day, and he was lying in the seamen's quarters in the fo'cas'le. By morning he felt much better, hungry, and prepared in his mind for striking a bargain with one of the sailors for clothes. He could make out their lingo soon, he guessed, and then he would get a suit of clothes and fare on deck. Suddenly he grasped his waist, struck with an unpleasant thought; his money-belt was gone! He was wearing a sailor's blue flannel shirt and nothing else. He turned over on his hard bunk, thinking that he would have to wait a while before making his entrance on the public stage of the Jeanne D'Arc.

And wait he did. Not a rag of clothing was in sight, and no cajolery or promise of reward could persuade the ship's men into supplying his need. He received consignments of food; short rations they would be, he judged, for an able-bodied seaman. But inactivity and confinement to the fo'cas'le soon worked havoc with his physique, so that appetite, and even desire of life itself, temporarily disappeared in the gloom of seasickness.

In spite of difficulties, Jim tried to find out something about the boat. The seamen were none too friendly; but by patching up his almost forgotten French and by signs, he learned something. His sudden failure of strength in the water had been due to a blow from a floating spar, as a bruise on his forehead testified; "the old man," whom Jim supposed to be the captain, was a hard master; Monsieur Chatelard was owner, or at least temporary proprietor, of the yacht; and the present voyage was an unlucky one by all the signs and omens known to the seamen's horoscope.

The sullenness of the men was apparent, and was not caused by the enforced presence of a stranger among them. In fact, their bad temper became so conspicuous that Jim began to believe that it might have something to do with the mysterious actions of the man on shore. He pondered the situation deeply; he evolved many foolish schemes to compass his own enlightenment, and dismissed them one by one. He grimly reflected that a man without clothes can scarcely be a hero, whatever his spirit. Not since the days of Olympus was there any record of man or god being received into any society whatever without his sartorial shell, thought Jimmy. But in spite of his discomfort, he was glad he was there. The intuition that had led him since that memorable Sunday afternoon was strong within him still, and he never questioned its authority. He believed his turn would come, even though he were a prisoner in the fo'cas'le of the Jeanne D'Arc.

As the violence of his sickness passed, Jim began to cast about for some means of helping himself. Gradually he was able to dive into the forgotten shallows of his French learning. By much wrinkling of brows he evolved a sentence, though he had to wait some hours before there was a favorable chance to put it to use. At last his time came, with the arrival of his former friend, the sailor.

"Oo avay-voo cashay mon money-belt?" he inquired with much confidence, and with pure Yankee accent.

The sailor answered with a shrug and a spreading of empty hands.

"Pas de money-belt, pas de pantalon, pas de tous! Dam queer Amayricain!"

Jim was not convinced of the sailor's innocence, but perceived that he must give him the benefit of the doubt. As the sailor intimated, Jim, himself, was open to suspicion, and couldn't afford to be too zealous in calumniating others. He fell to thinking again, and attacked the next Frenchman that came into the fo'cas'le with the following:

"Kond j'aytay malade don ma tate, kee a pree mon money-belt?"

It was the ship's cook this time, and he turned and stared at Jimmy as though he had seen a ghost. When he found tongue he uttered a volume of opinion and abuse which Jimmy knew by instinct was not fit to be translated, and then he fled up the ladder.

On the fourth day, toward evening, James had a visitor. All day the yacht had been pitching and rolling, and by afternoon she was laboring in the violence of a storm and was listing badly.

James was a fearless seaman, but it crossed his mind more than once that if he were captain, and if there were a port within reach, he would put into it before midnight. But he could tell nothing of the ship's course. He turned the subject over in his mind as he lay on his bunk in that peculiar state half-way between sickness and health, when the body is relaxed by a purely accidental illness and the mind is abnormally alert. He wished intensely for a bath, a shave, and a fair complement of clothes. He longed also to go up the hatchway for a breath of air, and was considering the possibility of doing this later, with a blanket and darkness for a shield, when he became conscious of a pair of neatly trousered legs descending the ladder. It was quite a different performance from the catlike climbing up and down of the sailors.

Jimmy watched in the dim light until the whole figure was complete, fantastically supplying, in his imagination, the coat, the shirt, the collar and the tie to go with the trousers—all the things which he himself lacked. Was there also a hat? Jimmy couldn't make out, and so he asked:

"Have you got on a hat?"

A frigid voice answered, "I beg your pardon!"

"I said, are you wearing a hat? I couldn't see, you know."

"Monsieur takes the liberty of being impertinent."

"Oh, excuse me—I beg your pardon. But it's so beastly hot and dark in here, you know, and I've never been seasick before."

"No? Monsieur is fortunate." The visitor advanced a little, drew from a recess a shoe-blacking outfit, pulled over it one of the stiff blankets from a neighboring bunk, and sat down rather cautiously. Little by little James made out more of the look of the man. He was large and rather blond, well-dressed, clean-shaven. He spoke English easily, but with a foreign accent.

"I wish to inquire to what unfortunate circumstances we are indebted for your company on the Jeanne D'Arc." The voice was cool and sharp as a meat-ax.

"Why, to your own kind-heartedness. I was a derelict and you took me in—saved my life, in fact; for which I am profoundly grateful. And I hope my presence here is not too great a burden?"

"I am obliged to say that your presence here is most unwelcome. Moreover, I am aware that your previous actions are open to suspicion, to express it mildly. You threw yourself off the tug; and as this is not a pleasure yacht, but the vessel of a high official speeding on a most important business matter, I said to the captain, 'Let him swim! Or, if he wishes to die, why should we thwart him?' But the captain referred to the 'etiquette of the line,' as he calls it, and picked you up. So you have not me to thank for not being among the fishes this minute."

Jimmy pulled his blanket about and sat up on his bunk. The sarcastic voice stirred his bile, and suddenly there boomed in his memory a woman's call for help. The hooded motor-car, the muffled cry of terror, the inert figure being lifted over the side of the yacht—these things crowded on his brain and fired him to a sudden, unreasoning fury. He leaned over, looking sharply into the other's face.

"You damned scoundrel!" he said, choking with his anger. The blood surged into his face and eyes; he was, for an instant, a primitive savage. He could have laid violent hands on the other man and done him to death, in the fashion of the half-gods who lived in the twilight of history.

The visitor in the fo'cas'le exhibited a neat row of teeth and no resentment whatever at Jim's remark. But a sharp glitter shot from his eyes as he replied suavely:

"Monsieur has doubtless mistaken this ship, and probably its master also, for some other less worthy adventurer on the sea. For that very reason I have come to set you right. It may be that I have my quixotic moments. At any rate, I have a fancy to give you a gentleman's chance. Monsieur, I regret the necessity of being inhospitable, but I am forced to say that you must quit the shelter of this yacht within twenty-four hours."

The thin, sarcastic voice and clean cut syllables fanned the flame of Jimmy's rage. He felt impotent, moreover, which never serves as a poultice to anger. But he got himself in hand, though imitation courtesy was not much in his line. He tuned his big hearty voice to a pitch with the Frenchman's nasal pipe, and clipped off his words in mimicry.

"And to whom, pray, shall I have the honor to say farewell, at the auspicious moment when I jump overboard?"

"Gently, you American, gently!" said the other. "My friends, and some of my enemies, know me as Monsieur Chatelard." As he paused for an impressive instant, Jim, grabbing his blanket, stood up in derision and executed an elaborate bow in as foreign a manner as he could command. Monsieur Chatelard politely waved him down and continued:

"But pray do not trouble to give me your card! I had rather say adieu to Monsieur the Unknown, whose daring and temper I so much admire. But I certainly misunderstood your violent remark a moment ago, did I not? You can not possibly have any ground of quarrel with me."

"I thought you stole my money belt."

Monsieur smiled and waved a deprecatory hand. "You have already dismissed that idea, I am certain. A money-belt, between gentlemen! Moreover, you should thank me for so much as recognizing the gentleman in you, since you are without the customary trappings of our class."

"Oh, I don't know," said Jim. But Monsieur Chatelard was now imperturbable. He continued blandly:

"Since you are fond of sea-baths, you will no doubt enjoy a plunge—tonight possibly. As we have made rather slow progress, we are really not so far from shore. Yes, on second thought, I would by all means advise you to take your departure tonight. Swim back to shore the way you came. In any case, your absence is desired. There will be no room or provision or water for you on board the Jeanne D'Arc after tonight. Is my meaning clear?"

Jim was watching, as well as he could, the immobile, expressionless face, and did not immediately note that Monsieur Chatelard had drawn a small, shiny object from his hip pocket and was holding it carelessly in his lap. As his gaze focussed on the revolver, however, he did the one thing, perhaps, which at that moment could have put the Frenchman off his guard. He threw his head back and laughed aloud.

But before his laugh had time to echo in the narrow fo'cas'le, Jim leaped from his bunk upon his tormentor, like a cat upon a mouse, seized his right hand in a paralyzing grip, and was himself thrown violently to the floor. The struggle was brief, for the Frenchman was no match for Jim in strength and scarcely superior to him in skill; but it took one of Jim's wrestling feints to get the better of his opponent. He came out, in five seconds, with the pistol in his hand. Monsieur Chatelard, a bit breathless, but not greatly discomposed, peered out at him from the edge of the opposite bunk, where he sat uncomfortably. His cynical voice capped the struggle like a streak of pitch.

"Pray keep the weapon. You are welcome, though your methods are somewhat surprising. Had I known them earlier, I might have offered you my little toy."

"Oh, don't mention it," said Jimmy. "I thought you might not be used to firearms, that's all."

The varnished surface of Monsieur Chatelard's countenance gave no evidence of his having heard Jim's remark.

"Don't fancy that your abrupt movements have deprived me of what authority I may happen to possess on this vessel. My request as to your future action still stands, unless you had rather one of my faithful men should assist you in carrying out my purpose."

Hambleton stood with legs wide apart to keep his balance, regarding the weapon in his hand, from which his gaze traveled to the man on the bunk. When it came to dialogue, he was no match for this sarcastic purveyor of words. He wondered whether Monsieur Chatelard was actually as cool as he appeared. As he stood there, the Jeanne D'Arc pitched forward until it seemed that she could never right herself, then slowly and laboriously she rode the waves again.

"You are a more picturesque villain than I thought," remarked James. "You have all the tricks of the stage hero—secret passages, fancy weapons, and—crowning glory—a fatal gift of gab!"

Monsieur Chatelard arose, making his way toward the hatch.

"Many thanks. I can not return the compliment in such a happy choice of English," he scoffed, "but I can truthfully say that I have rarely seen so striking and unique a figure as I now behold; certainly never on the stage, to which you so politely refer."

But James was too deeply intent on his next move to be embarrassed by his lack of clothes. Not in vain had his gorge risen almost at first sight of this man. He stepped quickly in front of Monsieur Chatelard, blocking his exit up the ladder, while the revolver in his hand looked straight between the Frenchman's eyes.

Whatever Chatelard's crimes were, he was not a coward. He did not flinch, but his eyes gleamed like cold steel as Jim cornered him.

"Now," said Jim, "I have my turn." Wrath burned in his heart.

"Captain Paquin! Antoine, Antoine!" called Chatelard. No one answered the call of the master of the ship, but even as the two men measured their force one against the other, they were arrested by a commotion above. Voices were heard shouting, trampling feet were running back and forth over the deck, and a moment later the ship's cook came tumbling down the hatchway, screaming in terror. He glared unheeding at the two men, and his teeth chattered. Fear had possession of him.

Jim lifted his revolver well out of reach, and backed off from Chatelard. For the first time during the interview between the American and the Frenchman, the two now faced each other as man to man, with the mask of their suspicions, their vanities and their hate cast aside.

"What is the matter? What is this fool saying?" Jim asked in loathing.

At last Monsieur Chatelard looked at Jim with eyes of fear. His face became so pale and drawn that it resembled a sponge from which the last drop of water had been pressed.

"He says the yacht is half full of water—that she is sinking," the Frenchman said.

"Sinking!" echoed Jim, bearing down again, with lowered revolver, on his enemy. "Well and good! You're going to be drowned, not shot, after all! And now you shall speak, you scamp! Your game's up. whatever happens. Get up and lead the way, quick, and show me in what part of this infernal boat you are hiding Agatha Redmond."

Chatelard started toward the hatchway, followed sharply by Jim's revolver, but at the foot of the ladder he turned his contemptuous, sneering face toward Jim, with the remark:

"Your words are the words of a fool, you pig of an American! There is no lady aboard this yacht, and I never so much as heard of your Agatha Redmond. Otherwise, be pleased to play Mercury to your Venus."

To Jim's ears, every syllable the Frenchman spoke was an insult, and words rekindled the fire in his blood.

"You shall pay for that speech here and now!" he yelled; and, discarding his revolver, he dealt the Frenchman a short-arm blow. Chatelard, trying to dodge, tripped over the base of the ladder and went down heavily on the floor of the fo'cas'le. He had apparently lost consciousness.

As Jim saw his victim stretched on the floor, he turned away with loathing. He picked up his revolver and went up the ladder. It was already dark, and confusion reigned on deck. But through the clamor, Jim made out something near the truth; the Jeanne D'Arc was leaking badly, and no time was to be lost if she, with her passengers and crew, were to be saved.

CHAPTER VII.

The Rope Ladder.

The near prospect of a conclusive struggle for life is a sharp tonic to the adventurous soul. The actual final summons to that other room is met variously. There is earthly dignity, who answers even this last tap at the door with a fitting and quotable rejoinder; there is deathbed repentance, whose unction in momento mortis is doubtless a comfort to pious relatives; and there are chivalry and valor, twin youths who go to the unknown banquet singing and bearing their garlands of joy.

But with the chance of a fight for life, there is a sharp-sweet tang that sends some spirits galloping to the contest. "Dauntless the slughorn to his lips be set—" making ready for the last good run.

When Jim descended the hatchway after reconnoitering on deck, Chatelard was gone. The ship's cook was rummaging in a sailor's kit that he had drawn from a locker. Jim mentally considered the situation. The seamen had no doubt exaggerated the calamity, but without question there was serious trouble. Were the pumps working? How far were they from shore? If hopelessly distant from shore, were they in the course of passing steamers? Would any one look after Miss Redmond's safety? Monsieur Chatelard had said that she was not on board, but James did not believe it.

While these thoughts flew through his mind, James had been absently watching while the cook turned his treasures out upon his bunk, and pawed them over with trembling hands. There were innumerable little things besides a stiff white shirt, a cheap shiny Bible, a stuffed parrot and several wads of clothes. And among the mess Jim caught sight of a piece of stitched canvas that looked familiar.

"Hi, you there! That's my money-belt!" he cried, and jumped forward to claim his own. But in his movement he failed to calculate with the waves. The yacht gave another of her deep-sea plunges, and Jimmy, thrown against his bunk, saw the cook grab his kit and make for the ladder. He regained his feet only in time to follow at arm's length up the hatchway. At the top he threw himself down, like a baseball runner making his base, after the seaman's legs; but instead of a foot, he found himself clutching one of the weeds of clothes that trailed after the cook's bundle. He caught it firmly and kept it, but the ship's cook and the rest of his booty disappeared like a rabbit into its burrow.

Jim sat down at the top of the ladder and examined his haul. It was a pair of woolen trousers, and they were of generous size. He spread them out on the deck. Round him were unmistakable signs of demoralization. The second officer was ordering the men to the pumps in stern tones; the yacht was pitching wildly and growing darkness was settling on the face of the turbulent waters. But in spite of it all, Jimmy's spirit leaped forth in laughter as he thought of his brief, frantic chase, and its results in this capture of the characteristic vestiture of man.

"What's money for, anyway!" he laughed, as he got up and clothed himself once more.

Proper Gymnastic Work.

Every person who has received gymnasium training is aware of the fact that an exercise which calls for painful effort on the part of the beginner is often performed almost without any conscious effort at all after a certain amount of training has been received. Again, it is perfectly well known that brute strength alone does not make a gymnast, and that even a simple exercise may offer great difficulty to a muscular and well developed individual who has not been trained in the gymnasium. The explanation for this is made plain in an article by Professor du Bois Reymond in Die Umschau, who points out that one of the essential functions of gymnasium work is not so much to build up muscle as to train nerves and nerve groups to work in proper unison and co-ordination.

Plenty of Evidence.

"I wonder," said Slithers, stopping his car at the roadside and addressing an old man working in the fields, "if I can get any gasoline around here?"

"I reckon ye kin," replied the old man, straightening up and leaning on his hoe. "Ye kin get it in yer system, anyhow. Them cars ahead o' ye seems to have left a few ton of it behind 'em, jedgin' by the condition of the atmosphere."—Judge

VEHICLE NOW CENTURY OLD

Family at Excello, Mo., Have "Prairie Schooner" That Is Still Well Preserved.

St. Louis, Mo.—We have all heard the familiar term "prairie schooner" applied to the old fashioned conveyance made use of by our grandfathers in the "early days" when they set out, full of hope, to find new homes for themselves in the great west, now our flourishing mid-continental states. At Excello, a small station near the county seat of Macon county, Missouri, resides a family which has in possession the relic of pioneer days pictured here. This ancient vehicle, unlike the "One Hoss Shay" of world-wide fame, has reached its one hundredth birthday without going to pieces, but continues to hold together, bound by its strong iron rivets and chains, as proudly, perhaps, as when it bore in its capacious bed the sturdy settler and his family traveling from Kentucky to the then far-off prairies and forests of North Missouri. The descendants of this pioneer family are among the leading and highly respected people of Macon and Randolph counties, and family pride is nowhere more justly in evidence than when, once a year, to the delight of neighbors and other visitors, "Old Missouri" is placed on exhibition at the fair at Jacksonville, a nearby village, where it becomes the center of attraction.

SAYS DIVORCE ROBS 70,000

New York Minister Provides Startling Figures for 1912 and Demands Uniform Law.

New York.—More than 70,000 children, mostly under the age of nine years, were deprived of one or both parents by divorce in this country during the last year, according to figures with which Rev. Francis M. Moody stirred members of the New York state marriage and divorce commission at a recent meeting.

"The Pacific coast," he said, "has been the greatest divorce center of the entire world. In the year 1912 alone there were granted in the United States more than 100,000 divorces. In forty years 3,700,000 adults were separated by divorce, and more than 5,000,000 persons affected by these cases.

"Illinois alone provided 120,000 divorces; Pennsylvania, 55,760; California, 50,000, and New York, 44,450. New York state, however, sent 18,169 of its couples into other states to procure divorces, and there were probably many migratory cases which are not recorded in this total. At present 90 per cent of the cases go by default, with only one party represented."

Mr. Moody offered a resolution to organize a federal commission in this state to work for a uniform federal law governing marriage and divorce, which would be the central organization for all state commissions of this character which already have been formed in some states, and which would meet in convention in Chicago in May. Rev. Dr. Samuel McCune Lindsay was appointed temporary chairman of the organizing committee.

TYPHOID SPREAD BY MAN

Thirty Cases of Disease and Three Deaths Since August, 1908, Are Traced to a Sailor.

Sacramento, Cal.—Harry Olsen, perambulating typhoid incubator, is still hatching deadly germs. To his record of having caused thirty cases and three deaths, another death has just been added. This beats, it is said, the record of "Typhoid Mary," famous in her day in New York.

Between August, 1908, and February 2, 1912, when he was a sailor on the ship Acme, 26 men contracted typhoid fever from him and three died. Olsen was detained and isolated at the United States Marine hospital.

Last October the doctors thought they had conquered the army of organisms and Olsen was free on probation. He got a job on the steam schooner Noyo, but not a month had elapsed before two men were attacked by typhoid fever. One of them died. Olsen was discharged to prevent a mutiny among the crew, and he must now go back to the hospital for further treatment.

Olsen may be subject to an operation for the removal of the gall bladder, which has been found to act as an asylum for germs.

TICKET LOST ON TITANIC

No Claimant Appears for the Recent Drawing of Bank of Italy's 1,500,000-Franc Lottery Number.

Rome.—No claimant has yet appeared for the first prize of 1,500,000 francs in the recent bank of Italy lottery. It is believed that the winning ticket may have been lost when the Titanic sank last April. All efforts to trace the holder of the ticket have been fruitless, and it is recalled that a batch of other tickets which were sent to the United States on the Titanic was lost.

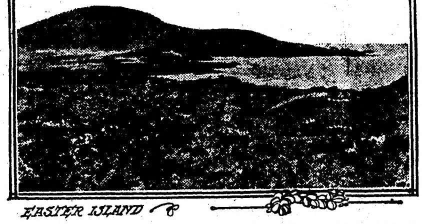
EASTER ISLAND, THE MYSTERY OF THE PACIFIC

by HARRY O. SANDBERG

STONE IMAGE IN THE NATIONAL MUSEUM

PRESENT DAY INHABITANTS OF EASTER ISLAND

SOME OF THE MONUMENTS ON EASTER ISLAND



EASTER ISLAND

ONCE again the luminous rays of the explorer are centered in the direction of Easter Island, the unsolved mystery of the Pacific. For another time the attention of archaeologists and students of antiquity is focused on this little spot, the most easterly of the Polynesian group of islands. Here, in the vast south Pacific ocean, lies this isle, volcanic in character, only 42 square miles in area, a mere speck of land, about one-fourth the size of Barbados, and yet surrounded by a charm of mystery possessed by few places in the world.

The island merged into the clear light of history early in the eighteenth century, when it was discovered by the Dutch captain, Jacob Roggeveen, in 1722. He gave to the island its present name in commemoration of the day on which land was sighted. Some 50 years later it was "rediscovered" by some Spanish sailors. From that time to the present day Easter Island has been visited, explored, and studied by noted travelers, scientists, and investigators from all lands, and it promises to afford these opportunities for expeditions for years to come.

Geographically considered, it lies 27 degrees 30 minutes south of the equator, so that it is not actually within the tropics. Its position is about 2,000 miles from the mainland of South America, and 1,400 miles distant from its nearest neighbor, the Pitcairn Islands. Within its limited area, triangular in shape, there are three craters of extinct volcanoes, one of them nearly 2,000 feet high. Some of the soil is fertile, and the island appears to have been wooded at one time, for decayed trunks of considerable size are still found; now, however, there thrive only a few bushes from 10 to 12 feet high. The natives grow many sorts of tropical fruits, including bananas, sugar cane, and sweet potatoes. Goats, fowl, sheep and a fair number of cattle are reared by the few hundred inhabitants, the sole dwellers of today in that mystic land. The climate is not unlike that of Madeira, with one wet and one dry season. The water supply consists of some brackish springs by the seashore and pools inside the craters of the volcanoes. All in all, however, the island is considered salubrious and healthful.

The chief interest of the island is to be found in the wonderful statues and other amazing archaeological remains. In its narrow and confined expanse it encompasses a mystery of vast proportions—an egima that has taxed the ingenuity of scientists quite as much as did of old the far-famed riddle of the Sphinx. In this tiny island is a remarkable display of hundreds of sculptured statues, colossal in size, and erected upon Cyclopean masonry; stone houses over 100 feet in length with walls six feet in thickness built like forts; and tablets curiously inscribed with hieroglyphics in no way resembling anything else in the world, doubtless the written language of the ancient inhabitants, but one to which the key has been lost.

Remarkable as all of these ruins are from the strangeness of their appearance, the greatest interest and the greatest problem which they present to us is the story that they might tell of the vanished civilization which erected them. That they are of prehistoric origin can not be questioned, but who were the builders of these wonderful specimens? What race of men or giants carved and placed in their present position the titanic stone heads that stand out in lonely majesty amid the barren wastes of this lonely little isle? Whence came these ancient workers in stone, and whither have they gone? What tools did they use to execute these singular statues and buildings, and in what epoch did they perform these curiosities?

Such fascinating questions and many others equally pertinent present themselves to the student, but, alas, the answer is yet to be had. Archaeologists must continue for a while longer to delve among the enshrouded mysteries of these ruins before they can reveal the true story of this world's wonderland. At present the chapters which have been written on the subject are comparatively few in number, and not conspicuously definite in context. Conjectures are as many as there are explorers, and the number of opinions ventured varies in the same ratio. Progress, as in all matters of science, is necessarily slow. But let us stop for a moment to examine these statues, and platforms, and relics, which have excited the student world, and to see what they are made of and how they were wrought.

By actual count there have been found no less than 550 of these images, most of which are cut out of gray trachitic lava. Of this number, 40 are standing inside the crater of one of the volcanoes, and as many more outside, at the foot of the slope, where they were placed ready for removal to the different platforms. These statues, morover, represent various stages of formation—some of them finished, others nearly completed, and still others barely commenced. In size they range from 3 or 4 feet to nearly 80 feet in length. The largest image, found in an unfinished state, measures 70 feet in length; the smallest is little short of 3 feet in length. Although these figures range in size from the colossus of 70 feet down to the pigmy of 3 feet, they clearly are all of the same type and general characteristics. The head is long and the eyes close under the heavy brows; the nose large, low bridged, and very broad at the nostrils; the upper lip short, and the lips pouting. The head is nearly always tilted backward. The lower part of the fact is broad and heavy, but imperfectly formed, the ears are long and pendant. The forms generally ended at the shoulders or at the waist, very little work being done below these points. One of the lesser statues has been brought to the National Museum at Washington, D. C., while another is on exhibition at the British Museum in London.

The striking feature about these figures is the strange facial expressions described as "profoundly solemn," "disdainful," and with "look of supercilious scorn."

The head was in all cases cut flat on top to accommodate an immense crown of red vesicular tuff, many of which were found at a crater eight miles distant from the cone, where the statues themselves were formed. Subsequent discoveries on the island have brought to light headdresses of real feathers, made up as crowns, coronets, and other shapes. The finding of these feather decotions which were used for ceremonial purposes has given strength to the belief that the immens stone crowns which were superimposed on the heads of the statues were intended to represent these feathered ornaments.

How these immense statues were cut out of their position inside the crater of the volcano and transported several miles to their respective platforms is one of the mysteries left for us to puzzle over. As for tools, a rude form of stone chisel is the only kind of ancient implement thus far found.

It is also remarkable that of the many hundreds of images scattered throughout the island there is but one that stands in its original position upon a platform, while the others are heedlessly strewn about. To some this fact seems conclusive proof that work on these huge productions ceased suddenly. But what caused the work to be so suddenly arrested? Did some volcanic eruption overtake the island? Such a conjecture is, indeed, not unreasonable, for closer investigation shows that some of the largest statues are buried to the neck in ash and scoria. But who can say with certainty?

Viewing the relics on the island in their entirety, however, one is impressed with the fact that when they were carried out a large population of skilled men must have concentrated upon the task. But where did this large population come from? Were Easter Island a continental land with ease of access, such an ample labor supply might have been available. But its geographic position precludes this possibility. Therefore another explanation must be sought. Now, nearly all students agree upon one point, and that is that the present territorial limitations of the place could not have harbored a very large number of inhabitants. First, there is no adequate water supply; and, secondly, there is not the area from which to win a sufficient food supply. This, then, suggests the theory, and one that is open to reasonable refutation, that Easter Island is the sole remnant of a greater land which was overwhelmed by the sea after a serious seismic disturbance.

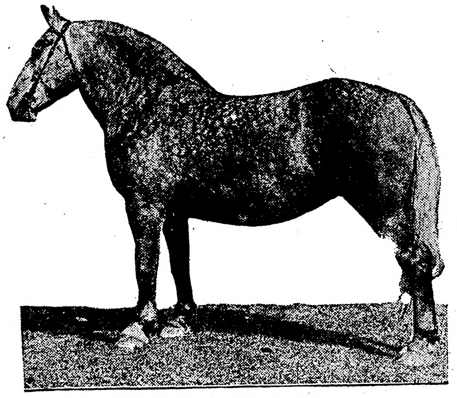
Another speculation offered by a noted traveler is of particular interest because of the connection which he endeavors to point out between these ruins and those found in the highlands of Peru and Bolivia. This archaeologist develops the theory that the ancient peoples of Easter Island were the same race that centuries afterwards laid the foundations of the empires of the Incas and the Aztecs. These people, he continues, reached Easter Island from the Asian coast by traveling from one island to another across the intervening ocean and finally found their way to the American continent over land that has since disappeared beneath the waters of the Pacific. This theory, important if true, is, however, subject to objections. In a careful study of the Malayo-Polynesian archaeology and languages, embracing a period of nearly 30 years, the noted botanist and ethnologist, Prof. W. E. Safford, of the United States department of agriculture, makes the unqualified assertion that in all his attempts to trace a connection between the ancient relics of the Incas and Aztecs with those of the Polynesians, he has failed to find sufficient points of similarity to justify even such a possible relation. So the mystery continues and the origin and workers of Easter Island are yet to be learned.

Wooden tablets have also been discovered incised with hieroglyphics. These are of especial interest because of the remarkable skill with which they were executed. The writings read from left to right; then it is necessary to turn the tablet upside down and continue reading from left to right, repeating this process until the inscription is concluded. Figures of men, animals, geometric designs, constitute the alphabet. Though these incised tablets have not been deciphered, there is a general belief that they contain the ancient myths of the race which inhabited the land. Some assert that it is not so very long ago that there were those on the island who might have been able to read them. It should be recalled that up to 1864 there were several thousand inhabitants on Easter Island, but large numbers of them were taken from there and put to work in the guano diggings on the Chincha Islands. Among those it is thought there were many who knew the written language as appearing on the tablets. But the present inhabitants, less than 200 in number, know nothing of them except in a vague way

One particular feature was emphasized by Professor Safford in an interview which the writer had with him on the subject of the language of the island. He declared that a careful study of the language of the modern natives shows it to be essentially Polynesian without any vestige of foreign domination, but the most remarkable thing is its very close similarity to the language of the Hawaiians. Nearly all of the words, by certain fixed laws or changes, could be converted from the Easter Island language to that of Hawaii with similar meanings; even some of the ancient gods of Easter Island bear the same names as Hawaiian gods. And yet there has been no connection between these two islands, at least not in historic times, and what is stranger still, these two groups are separated from each other by an interval of 2,000 miles. This unusual constancy in the language of both is probably due to the fact that they had no near neighbors and no intrusions of people speaking a language different from their own. He also expressed the opinion that the carvers of the images were the ancestors of the modern inhabitants, and that all the elements of the archaeology of the islands except the wonderful hieroglyphics are characteristically Polynesian.

IMPORANT ESSENTIALS IN BREEDING SHIRE HORSE FOR GENERAL FARM WORK

No Amount of Descriptive Writing Can Teach One to Judge Good Characteristics in Horse or Man—Great Care Should Be Exercised in Feeding Sensitive Stallions.



Excellent Type of Farm Animal.

The first thing a farmer must try to get is a mare or two of just the right sort to begin with. The age to buy is not of so much importance; by buying fillies at one to two years old they have the full length of their breeding life before them, but at the same time there is the risk of their proving non-breeders, or inferior breeders, while by buying a mare that has bred a foal or two successfully we discount the risk, but have to pay a higher price, and lose as much of her life as has passed. The mare that has begun to breed is the safest speculation.

In selecting the brood mare the character, symmetry, style, constitution, soundness and type are of even greater importance than pedigree. It is well to have a type of perfection in one's eye, and to get as near that as possible.

The head and eyes should betoken docility, intelligence and courage. It is only by close observation that any one can acquire the art of recognizing character in a mare. No amount of descriptive writing can teach one how to judge these characteristics in horse or man. The loin, of course, should be strong, and the tail well set up, in line with the back, not drooping. In a brood mare a strong, healthy constitution is of the utmost importance.

As for size, a mare standing sixteen hands high, and built in proportion, is big enough. Color may be selected according to taste, but a brown or bay animal is always more salable than a black or any of the lighter colors.

When buying every precaution should be taken to insure soundness—that is, absence of all hereditary disease, and a few dollars extra should not prevent a bargain being made if the mare approaches anywhere near the ideal above described.

Great care should be taken in feeding all animals, particularly stallions, which are more sensitive than mares or geldings. Horses should be fed very regularly. Feeding time should not vary ten minutes from a stated hour. The stomach is a sensitive organ and soon becomes educated to expect food at certain hours. If that expectation is regularly gratified the animal thrives better. My method of feeding horses is: Morning feed at 5:45 o'clock; noon feed at 11:45, and night feed at 5:30 in winter, 5:45 in summer. This schedule is strictly adhered to at all times.

The amount of food to give a stallion, except during the stud season, is about three quarts of oats in the morning, two quarts of crushed oats and two quarts of bran at noon; three quarts of boiled oats, one quart of bran and one tablespoon of oil meal at night. The stallion should have from fifteen to eighteen pounds of hay each day the year round. He should be given a light feed of hay (say five pounds) in the morning, the balance in the evening.

After the stud season commences, about March 1, I add two quarts of boiled barley to the evening feed. The barley strengthens the stallion in flesh and semen and makes him a surer getter. During a heavy stud season mix a half-dozen raw eggs with the evening feed.

The stallion should be watered before feeding. Let him drink all he wants. Water him after feeding also.

We now come to the actual act of breeding. I advise that the stallion visit the mare after four o'clock in the afternoon, or even after six. It is quieter then, and neither mare nor stallion is so liable to become uneasy and excited.

The stallion should be led to the breeding pen as quietly as possible to avoid nervousness. Everything should be ready. Do not keep him waiting. I would advise hobbling the mare on all occasions in order to protect the horse from fright and accident.

RYE FIELD USED THREE GOOD WAYS

Acre or Two of Rich Land Will Produce Large Amount of Early Green Feed.

(By WALTER B. LEUTZ.)

Rye which is sown in the fall for green feed during cold weather may be economically used in at least three ways the next spring and the early summer. One of these ways is to use it for pasture. Another way is to use it for a summer soiling crop for milk cows. An acre or two on rich land will produce a large amount of early green feed and the crop can be used for nearly three months. To use rye as a soiling crop, keep the stock off it in the spring and when it is tall enough to cut take the mower to the patch and cut enough for two days feeding. Rake this and store it in the barn and feed out. Then mow enough more for another two days feeding and continue the same method till the patch is all mown. By this time the rye of the first mowing will have grown up enough for a second cutting and in succession it may be cut several times during the early spring and summer. In this way a great number of cows may be kept on a limited area of pasture.

Cost of Butter Fat.

Cow Tester H. D. Wetherell, Somerset county, Mo., reporting 16 herds of 95 milking cows in all, finds the average feed cost for one pound of butter fat 22 cents. Highest cost was 39 cents in one herd, and the lowest cost 11.7 cents in another herd.

Broken Limbs.

Broken limbs should all be attended to now. Some may be saved by hoisting back to place and bolting them to the main trunks. Those that cannot be saved should be cut off and the wounds painted with white lead and oil.

CARROTS DO WELL ON FRIABLE SOIL

Gardener Should Endeavor to Grow Plant Quickly to Secure Best Results.

(By ALTON E. GOSSO.)

Carrots do well on most any garden land but they prefer a moist, deep, loamy, friable soil. The gardener should try to grow the carrot quickly in order to secure tender, sweet, uniform specimens. Avoid hard, dry, crusty soil. Seeds may be sown in rows by using a hand drill. Have the rows wide enough to admit horse cultivation. When the plants have grown three to four inches high, thinning should be done, leaving only the larger plants in the row from four to six inches apart. The seed should be thickly sown for many may not germinate. Carrots should be sown early, as the crop, especially the late varieties require a long season. The carrot, like most all root crops, responds readily to frequent cultivation. Only the table varieties should be grown in a home garden. By judicious choice of varieties, carrots may be enjoyed for a long season. The late varieties can be left in the ground until late when they should be dug and stored in the cellar or buried in the field similar to cabbage.

Care of Plants in Winter.

Look to the Dahlia and Canna tubers stored in the cellar. If it is too damp mold will have formed and cause decay if not removed. Spread the tubers out where the air is dry and separate the perfectly good roots from those touched with mold. If, on the contrary, the roots look shriveled, put them near the floor in a damp corner of the cellar. Ventilation must be given the cellar during the winter to keep it dry.

Be very sure that there are no cracks or loose window panes to let in draft and frost.

The TRUTH ABOUT THE CASE

The Experiences of M. F. Goron, Ex-Chief of the Paris Detective Police

THE SCAR

(Copyright by J. B. Lippincott Co.)

A LADY is waiting for you, sir," said my secretary, as I came to my office an hour later.

"Already?"

"Yes, she has been here a long time," and, as he spoke, my visitor entered the room.

I have seen some handsome women, but never one to approach her. A lovely, graceful figure, her golden hair like an aureole round the shapely head.

"Pray take a seat," I said. "What can I do for you?"

She sat, or rather dropped, down into the proffered arm-chair, trembling from head to foot, convulsed by sobs. I pretended to look over some papers to give her time to recover. Then, after two or three ineffectual attempts to speak, she said:

"I am Madame R——; my name, I think, is not unknown to you."

I nodded, for I had often seen it among those of our brilliant society women.

"But"—and then she again burst into tears—"I am lost, lost! What shall I do unless you help me?"

"Calm yourself," I said, holding a glass of water to her lips, the tumbler clicking against her small white teeth. She rocked herself to and fro, and then, after a violent effort, unfolded her tale—the old, old tale of a woman's folly and a man's wickedness. In a low voice she began:

"I will not trouble you with the story of my wretched youth, in a lonely country house, my father always away in Paris on some business or other, and myself given over to the care of a cross, hard, bigoted maiden aunt, supposed to replace my mother, whom I have never known. When I was nineteen I married M. R——. I hardly knew him, but I longed to get away from the maddening, dull life in that melancholy country house, with no other company than that of my old aunt, and a few old ladies of the same stamp."

She clenched her little fists, and, fixing her eyes on me with a frightened stare:

"Monsieur Goron," she cried, "you come across terrible misery and trouble, but none of the wretched beings whom it is your duty to arrest can be any worse than those who deliberately wrecked a woman's life. The scoundrel, the scoundrel—"

She had risen from her chair.

"My marriage," she continued, "was a farce, a grotesque farce. My father had neglected me; horses, women, the baccarat engrossed him. Two days after my wedding I realized what marriage would mean to me! My husband, as you know, is a distinguished antiquarian—"

She paused a moment, with her hand to her throat, and then resumed:

"I rank after the old coins and musty manuscripts on which he wastes his money and time. Again I was left to myself, but I was free; and, with money at my command, plunged into the so-called pleasures of society. If only God had given me a child, a darling I could have loved, all this misery would have been spared me. But that, too, had been denied me. Courted and flattered, I had plenty of opportunities to 'console' myself—like many ladies of my acquaintance—but I had the strength to resist. I have a letter my mother wrote to me nineteen years ago, when she knew she was dying, wherein she exhorts me, when I grow up, to think of her and act rightly. I have always this letter with me. It is a talisman. But—"

She stopped and looked away.

"I can guess," I said soothingly, "only tell me what brings you here, and what I can do for you."

She shuddered, as if in recollection of something nauseous.

"Yes, you can guess—I met him at Trouville last summer, and was fascinated by his looks and his manner. I forgot all; my mother's letter, my good resolutions, all, all, all! I only thought of him. I loved and thought I was loved For the first time in my wretched existence I knew what happiness meant. And then—"

But only inarticulate sounds came from her.

"Monsieur Goron," she cried, "that man is a monster, a fiend. I found out his treachery and told him I would never look at him again. But he holds me in his grasp. I wrote him four letters, and what letters! And, under the threat of delivering them to my husband, he has already had three thousand pounds from me. He wants another four hundred, by tomorrow night. I have no more money at my bank, and have parted with all my jewels. What am I to do, what am I to do? If you do not help me in my trouble and rid me of that man, I shall be disgraced, and must kill myself. And I want to live, to expiate, to repent, and earn my mother's forgiveness. I want to live, Monsieur Goron, I will not die! In the name of your mother, save me!' She stopped. She was quite exhausted.

The poor woman's case was, unfortunately, not an exceptional one. Blackmailers—of both sexes—carry out their nefarious trade in every class of society. Success, in fact, emboldens them; for it is rarely that the victims, unless driven to despair, like Madame R——, have the courage to come forward.

"My dear madame," I said, "I see no cause for alarm. That man is a common blackmailer, and, before this evening, he—"

"No, no!" she shrieked. "I know what you mean. You must not arrest him. You must not; for he would at once carry out his threat. All I want are those letters. What becomes of him afterwards is of no importance. Don't you understand?"

"Yes, I quite understand. Yet, unless I arrest him. I do not see—"

"No, no!" she repeated, more vehemently, "you do not realize my danger! He is a desperate character; he fears nobody, and if you try to frighten him he will turn on me! Get those letters! Save me!"

After a moment's pause I asked:

"Is he a Frenchman?"

"No, he is a Cuban; of a first-class family, I think."

"Give me his name and address, and also the dates of those letters, if you remember them."

She wrote everything down and handed me the slip.

The more I heard of this business the less I liked it, although I knew full well that unless something were done a catastrophe would ensue. On the other hand, Madame R—— had tied my hands; I had no legal hold on her tormentor, and I did not see how, under these conditions, I could bring him to bay. But her sad story had moved me, and I resolved to try my luck. I had often tried it before and found it answered.

I led her to a small room near my office and told her to wait.

"You must be patient," I warned her, "for it may take me some time, and, remember, I guarantee no results."

I sent a note to the Cuban, asking him to call on me without delay. My messenger found him at home. There came a knock on my door, and a tall man with very dark hair and blue eyes entered my office. His clothes fitted him well, and he had that easy grace of those moving in good society. His manners were perfect, and in any drawing room his general appearance would have passed muster.

Yet, to the practiced eye, there was in him something of the adventurer, of the man who looks upon the thousands in other people's pockets as his own. Audacity and unscrupulousness were written in every feature, and I knew a difficult task lay before me.

"Do you know why I sent for you?" I at once began.

"No."

"Cannot you guess?"

"No."

"I asked you to come here because I want you to return me some letters, four of them, written to you by Madame R——. Do you understand now?"

"Yes, I do. But, pardon me for saying, by what right do you claim these letters?"

"Tut, tut. You are a stranger; yet I dare say, you understand enough of French law to know that you have been guilty of an ugly offense, which may get you into serious trouble. Are you aware that I can arrest you here, in my office, on a charge of blackmail?"

The Cuban smiled—not a pretty smile—and twirled his mustache.

"You cannot arrest me," he said quietly. "You cannot do so, unless some one has laid such a foolish charge against me. I am sure Madame R——, whom I have the pleasure of knowing, would never dream of putting forward such an accusation. Who, then, is the mysterious person I am supposed to have injured? Although I am, as you say, a stranger, I have some little knowledge of French law, and I have the right to know whence you derive your information."

The scoundrel was making fun of me. He complacently stroked his mustache, and, for the second time, I noticed that he mechanically pulled down his right cuff.

I felt him slipping through my fingers; and there was the poor creature in the adjoining room, his victim; depending on me to release her from his clutches. It was maddening.

He looked at his watch, rose from his chair, and politely asked me whether I had anything more to say, as he had an important engagement in town.

I was growing desperate, and felt tempted to call Madame R—— into my office, and force her to formally charge the man and bring him within my grasp. A moment's reflection showed me the uselessness of such a course. She would be too frightened to act upon my suggestion.

He walked towards the door.

"Stop!" I shouted. "I have one or two questions to ask you." I wanted to gain time.

The Cuban looked at me, slightly surprised.

"How long have you been in Paris?" I asked.

"Seven months," he replied.

Then I risked a random shot.

"What is your real name? No, not the one on your card, but the name your father bore?" If you had a father, I added mentally.

Thus far my man had not turned a hair. His tone now became sharp.

"What right have you to ask me such a question?" He was losing his temper.

He gave his mustache another twirl and, just as he was again pulling down his cuff, I noticed a scar across his right wrist.

It was an ordinary scar, slightly jagged toward the middle, a scar that might have been caused by a fall when he was a boy. Now, however, it took gigantic proportions, and I felt instinctively that I had laid my finger on something that might turn the scales in our favor. It required, nevertheless, grave caution with such an opponent. A false move would mean failure. In a moment I had formed my plan, and started the attack.

I called in one of my men, ordering him to remain with the Cuban until I returned.

It was only intuition, not inference, that caused me to fasten on this scar as the means of bringing the fellow to bay; but, as I discovered in the course of my career, in difficult and subtle cases inspiration is no detracting factor in detective work.

Madame R—— had warned me not to attempt to frighten the ruffian. This would have been a wrong course towards anyone with a clean record. With the class of man like the one before me, I not only could risk the experiment, but I had no other alternative.

After a few minutes I returned to my office, with a book containing the photos of as fine a collection of scamps as ever disgraced this earth. The Cuban's handsome features did not figure in the set. But this he could not know. I glanced at the portraits until I came to a certain page, compared what I was supposed to see with some papers I took out of a drawer, and then, walking up to him, said, in a not very gentle voice:

"Show me your wrist."

I noticed an almost imperceptible twitch of the eyelids as he held out his left hand.

"No, the other," I cried.

And this time it was I who raised the cuff; and there was the scar. I gazed at it long, and then at the man whose hand I held. I saw he made violent efforts to remain calm, but the ferocity of the dangerous animal gleamed in his eyes.

"That's all right," I began cheerily, "now we can talk."

His eyes were riveted on me.

"A quarter of an hour ago," I resumed, "you declined to return me those letters. Do you still refuse?"

The Cuban made no answer. How much of his secret—for a secret there undoubtedly was— did I know? What would occur if he declined to give up the letters? What could he extort from me if he acceded to my request?

I understood the desperate struggle in his mind and watched him intently. It was evident he waited for me to say something. Seeing I remained silent he began, in a voice suddenly grown husky:

"Monsieur Goron—legally you have no right to demand those letters, but—" He paused suddenly, well knowing that the dangerous moment for him had arrived, and that he had to weigh every word. Again he looked at me as if for support, and, not receiving any, he continued:

"But, supposing I should give them up—what—am I to—expect in return for my—courtesy?"

The word "courtesy" made me smile. It was typical of the man.

"My dear sir," I replied, "I must not be behind you in the way of courtesy. Now, this is what you can expect from me. You will go to your chambers. You will come back at once with the letters; and I will allow you till tomorrow midday to pack your belongings and clear out of France. If you refuse, you and I will have another kind of talk."

This time the Cuban's thoughts moved quicker. He dropped his grand manners and also his lazy drawl.

"Do you give me your word that if I agree to this you will not molest me under some foolish pretense or other?" he asked.

"I give you my word," I retorted, "that you will not be molested under any foolish pretense."

"I accept," he called out, and moved quickly towards the door.

"Hold hard, my friend," I cried, "you are too hasty. I want to show you more courtesy. A man of your position must not go about like an ordinary mortal; you shall have a guard of honor."

I rang the bell.

"Tell Inspector Leroux I want him

"Leroux," I said, when that official made his appearance, "this gentleman is going to his chambers in the Rue d'Alger to fetch some documents. You are to accompany him, and not to leave him a second out of your sight. The Rue d'Alger is not far. Take a cab. I expect you back in half an hour—with the gentleman, remember. I recommend him to your care."

"All right, sir," grinned Leroux "I'll look after him."

A heavy day's work lay before me, yet I had not the patience to attend to other matters until this business was settled, especially with the half frantic woman near me. Before I had finished my third cigarette the Cuban, followed by the grinning Leroux, entered.

Without a word the fellow deposited the letters on my desk. I carefully examined them, and found that they corresponded with the dates given me by Madame R——.

For a moment this pseudo-gentleman and I looked at one another. I do not know whether he read my thoughts regarding him, but I was not in doubt as to his wishes for my future welfare.

"And now we are quits," I exclaimed. "I wish you a pleasant journey, and, pray, do not forget tomorrow midday. It is important!"

He gave me an unlovely scowl, made a slight bow, and was gone.

It was with a lighter heart that I opened the door of the little room where Madame R—— was awaiting events. On seeing me she turned deathly pale, and followed me to my office.

"Listen," I said sternly, for she, too, deserved a lesson. "You have thrown an unpleasant task upon my shoulders. If the Recording Angel puts a black mark against me, I hope he will take into consideration the charitable motives that prompted me, chief of the detective police, to commit an illegal act. Now, Madame R——, if I not only restore these letters to you, but even guarantee you will never see the face of one of the biggest rogues in the shape of a man, will you promise, will you swear, that this danger from which you have escaped, will be a lesson to you for life; and that you will never again stray from the right path?" And I held out the little bundle.

"I swear," she gasped. Clutching the letters, she looked at them with feverish haste and then tore them into a thousand bits, which, womanlike, she scattered all over my carpet, ignoring the waste paper basket at her feet.

I watched her go to the window, where she remained, her back turned towards me, her face buried in her hands. Was she praying? I think so; and, for several minutes, not a word was spoken.

She slowly turned round and walked to the table where I sat and, with an expression that removed from my mind the last trace of remorse for my illegal act, she seized both my hands and said:

"Monsieur Goron—dear Monsieur Goron—how—how can I thank you?"

"Madame," I answered, "I am not entitled to your gratitude. You have to thank the scar."

She opened her eyes in astonishment.

"The scar—what scar?"

"The one on the man's right wrist."

"On his right wrist? I—I—never saw it!"

"No, but I did!"

Five years elapsed.

One morning, passing through the Parc Monceau, I saw an elegantly dressed, handsome young woman walking with a nurse carrying a baby. I at once recognized Madame R——. She colored slightly, and, without uttering a word, held up the baby; raising its tiny hand to her lips, she sent me a kiss. I understood.

And the Cuban?

A few days later, a New York paper brought the story of a fracas in a San Francisco gambling house where three men had been shot. The body of one, a dark-complexioned man, with a scar on his right wrist, had not been identified.

Was it my Cuban?

I think so.

MYSTERY OF THE SAWS.

Barz Was Using Them to Cut Bars of Cell.

It was dark in the Queens county (N. Y.) jail on Friday night, dark and with that peculiarly gruesome dimness due to lack of light common to most jails even in fiction. Through the labyrinthine gloom one could hear the dull, monotonous voices of the prisoners dictating letters to their friends.

Ever and anon through the drear, tearwet place came the steady tread that the feet of prisoners make treading up and down—and particularly downstairs when they are going out of the front door away from there forever, it may be, provided they don't catch them and bring 'em back.

But hark, what is that rasping noise? The grim warden rises in his chair, clutching the back of it in his iron grip. He leans forward intent, every nerve aquiver. He is listening, listening.

Chapter Two: The Warden Smells a Plot.

"Keeper Winterbottom!"

The gruff summons cuts the gloomy atmosphere. There is a clanking of iron and a heavy tread. It hardly seems ten minutes before another grim faced gaoler steps into the room. He stands dourly in the doorway, his eagle eye upon his superior's left ear.

"Keeper Winterbottom!" thunders the solemn voice; "wot is that there noise?"

Chapter Three: The Investigation.

Keeper Winterbottom put his hand to his head and again the clanking noise rose up.

"Please, sir," he cried, "it sounds like some bloke was tryin' to get out."

There was a moment of tense silence. The warden looked at Keeper Winterbottom with a flash in his scornful eye.

"Of course some one is trying to get out." His voice rose almost to a shriek as the keeper staggered backward. "Some one is always getting out. Don't you know the reputation o' this here jail?"

"But how is they trying to get out? That's the question. How is they?"

He drew the palsied keeper to him, bent over and whispered something in Keeper Winterbottom's aspen ear, while the rasping noise boomed and echoed through the desolate building.

"They's sawin' their way out," he sibilated; "that's wot they's doin'."

For fifteen minutes the pulmotor operator worked over the keeper's unconscious form. The shock had been too much for his sensitive heart.

Chapter Four: Discovered.

John Barz was at the window of his cell on the fourth floor of the dark Queens county jail, Friday night, sawing at a bar.

Three saws with iron handles each six inches long lay on the cot behind him. In one corner was a rope 40 feet long made of strips of blanket. From the window of the jail to the street it is 40 feet. Ha! A coincidence!

Suddenly the door to the cell flung open. Two keepers stood in the doorway. They turned reproachful eyes upon the man at the window. He looked at them impatiently. Suddenly like a bayed tiger he whirled on them.

"Shoo, get out," he panted.

Gently they laid hands on John Barz. Quietly they explained to him the error of his ways. What kind of a guy was he, they asked, going to all that trouble getting out with saws and things? Didn't he know where he was?

Didn't he know the thing to do was to take a keeper out in the back yard and point out a tall building in the middle distance to him, and while the keeper was looking up at it go decently and like a gentleman over the fence, if he just must get out? Ah, he hadn't acted right.

So Barz, who is twenty-three years old and was arrested on September 20 for sticking up farmers on Metropolitan avenue, was led away to a nice new cell downstairs, a sadder and a wiser man.

They're thinking of taking him before the grand jury and indicting him all over again for conduct unbecoming a prisoner.

It seems that a girl friend of Barz's who used to come and bring him cream celery soup in a can must have had all these saws and things in the bottom of the can. Just how she got them in when the soup was tasted at the door with a spoon could not be explained yesterday. But there are a lot of folks over there who think they're smart who went around talking about false bottoms.

Sentimental Cherry Trees.

"If you live in a boarding house back room, and if you see through your window some day that the landlady is trying her best to protect some little sprigs of trees along the board fence from the cold, covering the roots with straw and the treetops with burlap, you need not go to the trouble of asking what kind of trees they are," said the gray-headed man. "You may set them down at once as Japanese cherry trees.

"They are planted there because a Japanese once boarded in the house, and after he went home he sent the landlady the very nicest thing he could think of as a token of appreciation and esteem. That meant Japanese cherry trees. There are three cherry trees in our back yard. The landlady mothered a young Japanese who boarded with her through a spell of sickness. He got well and went home. First thing along came the cherry trees. They are thrifty trees, but they still get a good deal of coddling."

His Two Aims.

Frank Krause, a Cleveland philanthropist, has established the Thirty Cent Egg club, and hopes, by means of a club boycott, to bring down the price of eggs to a reasonable figure.

Being complimented on the hard and unselfish work he has given to this movement, Mr. Krause replied:

"Unselfish work, work that doesn't pay, is what this country needs more than anything else. We are all too mercenary here. I once said to a little newsboy:

"'Have you an aim in life?'

"'Yes, sir. I have two aims,' he replied.

"'What are they, my son?'

"'The first is to become a millionaire.'

"'Aha! And the second?'

"'The second is to become a multimillionaire.'"

Infantile Paralysis.

The horrors of infantile paralysis will not be alleviated by the note of Dr. Simon Flexner and two associates, appearing in the Journal of the American Medical Association, that the healthy parents of patients may be carriers of the disease. Dr. Flexner reports that washings from the nasopharynx of the parents of a child suffering from an acute attack were inoculated on October 28 last in a monkey, the Macacus cynomolgus:

"Recovery from the anesthetic was prompt and the animal remained well until November 11, when it was noted to be excitable and to drag the right leg. The left leg proved to be weak. November 12 the right leg was definitely flaccid."

Two days later portions of the spinal cord and medulla "showed typical lesions of experimental poliomyelitis."

DOINGS OF THE SOLONS

Minnesota Legislative Affairs of the Past Week—Law Makers Hard at Work.

St. Paul, Feb. 1.—Investigation of campaign funds in Minnesota during the past two years is demanded by Senator Ole Sageng. In a resolution presented in the senate yesterday he would have the legislature name a joint committee with full power to investigate the campaign funds of every man who ran for office in the last two campaigns.

Senator Sageng would have a committee of six members, three from each house appointed by the speaker and the lieutenant governor, respectively. He would give this committee powers and would have $1,000 appropriated for expenses.

To Prohibit Speculation.

Prohibition of wheat speculations on the floor of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce is sought in a bill introduced in the lower house of the legislature by James Dwyer of Minneapolis. It provides that any man who loses money in wheat speculation may recover it with costs by a civil suit.

The proposed law does not reach what Mr. Dwyer terms "legitimate speculation" on wheat. He said that it was intended to prohibit speculation in futures, buying of options on wheat without a bona fide contract for delivery and speculating on margins.

After Brewery-Owned Bars.

Two bills designed to break up an alleged saloon trust and prohibit brewery ownership of saloons have been introduced in the house by F. L. Klemer of Faribault.

They provide that no brewery or wholesale liquor company can obtain a saloon permit, that no corporation or person can own more than one license and that an applicant for a license must make affidavit that he is neither an employe or agent of any brewery or liquor organization.

Bill for Insurance Fund.

Another workmen's compensation act has been introduced in the senate. Senator Swanson is the sponsor. The bill would provide for a mutual insurance fund to be under the direction of a state board. The bill is similar to one introduced by the senate committee on workmen's compensation, but it would give a man, permanently injured, compensation for life.

A minimum wage law will be constitutional. This is the opinion of the attorney general, given to Senator Manley Fosseen, chairman of the senate labor committee. The bill introduced by Senator James F. Boyle was submitted to the attorney general. With a few minor amendments the attorney general believes the bill will be constitutional.

October 12 as Legal Holiday.

The house committee on legislation has reported favorably on the Vasaly bill making Columbus day, Oct. 12, a legal holiday. It received the unanimous vote of the committee. Two years ago a similar bill was introduced by J. J. Moriarity of Belle Plaine and lost by a narrow margin. The bill is backed by the Knights of Columbus of the state.

Efforts to include sugar in the free lumber resolution offered by Senator Moonan of Waseca proved unavailing when the matter was brought before the senate sitting as a committee of the whole.

St. Paul, Jan. 31.—The employers' liability bill prepared by the special senate committee has been presented in the senate. It does not require the employer to contribute to any insurance fund. This feature was incorporated in the previous bills and brought much strong objection.

To Continue Investigation.

It is probable that the house committee on acounts and expenditures, which has been making a sweeping investigation of the various state departments, will join hands with the senate in the selection of a committee to continue the investigation after the present session has closed. The task, the committee finds, is beyond it, as far as the present session is concerned, and the idea is to continue it and have the committee report its findings, together with recommendations, to the next legislature.

Minnesota-Wisconsin Dispute.

The Minnesota-Wisconsin boundary dispute is again up. As it is, a commission, made up of senators and representatives from each state, has studied the question for two years and is unable to agree.

A report will be made by the commission to members of the Minnesota and Wisconsin legislatures today. This report will state that no agreement as to the boundary, either of Lake Pepin or at St. Louis Bay in Lake Superior, can be reached. It will, however, make recommendations that the two legislatures enact uniform legislation regarding the fish and game regulations on the boundary.

Has Iowa been benefited by its distance tariff law?

This is the question that was asked and answered in different ways at the senate railroads committee hearing on the Cashman distance tariff bill yesterday. Railroad tariff experts stated that Iowa had not been benefited. They pointed to the decrease in population in the rural districts. Senator Cashman contended that Iowa had been benefited.

First Reapportionment Tilt.

The first reapportionment tilt came in the house committee yesterday when members of a sub-committee representing the various congressional districts reported that they had been unable to agree. The dispute came among the members from the second, third and sixth districts, who were hopelessly divided. They were given further time to reach an agreement.

St. Paul, Jan. 30.—The women champions of suffrage refuse to be downcast over their defeat in the state senate. They still have hope of passing the measure at this session.

New Tax Bill.

H. H. Dunn of Albert Lea yesterday introduced a bill in the house providing for the submission of an amendment to the constitution which would allow a 7 per cent gross earning tax on all street railway companies.

Two cent passenger fares may be returned to the people of Minnesota notwithstanding any adverse decision which might be given by the United States supreme court in the Minnesota rate cases.

The Bendixen bill, providing a 2 cent rate on all railroads which earn more than $1,200 a mile, was recommended for passage by the house railroads committee yesterday by unanimous vote. It will first be sent to the judiciary committee which will pass on its constitutionality.

Coates Is Seated.

After a stormy session, lasting five hours, the house elections committee last night decided to seat Joseph H. Coates as a member of the lower house of the legislature. He was given a majority of one vote over Charles A. Gilman, who had contested his election. The committee vote was 11 to 7, with three members absent. Representatives Ribenack, Porter and Frankson, the absent members, are said to favor Mr. Coates, which would increase his committee vote to 14.

Up to Governor.

The bill introduced by H. H. Dunn in the house last week providing for the reservation of mineral rights on lands already granted to the Dultuh and Iron Range railroad lacks only the governor's signature to become a law. It was passed by the senate yesterday afternoon after several attempts had been made to have it referred to the judiciary committee to test its constitutionality.

St. Paul, Jan. 29.—Woman's suffrage was defeated in the state senate yesterday. Hundreds of women in the galleries and on the floor of the senate saw the measure lost by a vote of 33 to 30.

Four senators who voted for the measure two years ago, Senators Duxbury, Cheadle, Olson and C. D. Johnson, voted against it this year. Four other senators, Dwinnell, Duea, Clague and Fosseen, changed their votes the other way. The vote against the bill two years ago was 30 to 32. It was 30 to 33 this year, the extra vote against the measure being cast by Senator Stebbins, who was absent two years ago.

Forestry Appropriation.

A bill appropriating $100,000 for the use of the state forestry board in buying land for forestry purposes was introduced in the senate yesterday by D. M. Gunn of Grand Rapids. The bill prescribes that not more than $2 per acre shall be paid for land and that no land suitable for agriculture shall be purchased. The creating of a state forest at the height of land north of Grand Rapids is recommended by the state forester, W. T. Cox, and the bill if passed would permit the forestry board to purchase 50,000 acres or more for this purpose.

The so-called Mershon scheme of canals, debated by the last two legislatures, came into the senate today in the form of a bill by Senator Edward Rustad of Wheaton, requiring the appointment of a state commission to investigate the scheme. The plan includes the digging of canals from Lake of the Woods to Lake Traverse, and from Vermillion lake to Red lake, the construction of an 80-foot dam at Granite Falls, creating an inland sea in the Minnesota valley above that city, and the construction of a ship canal from near Granite Falls to Lake Superior, crossing the Mississippi near Sauk Rapids.

Dr. R. S. Mac Arthur Resigns.

Atlanta, Ga., Jan. 30.—Dr. Robert Stuart Mac Arthur, president of the World's Baptist alliance, has resigned as pastor of the Baptist Tabernacle here. The action, it is said, came as a climax to factional disputes which have existed in the church since Rev. Leon G. Broughton resigned as pastor to accept the charge of Christ Church in London. Dr. Mac Arthur was for several years pastor of Calvary church, New York, and will return to that city.

Horseback To West.

New York, Feb. 1. — A coast to coast trip on horseback by women suffragists is being discussed for the spring. It is proposed to start from this city as soon as the highways in the East are fit for travel and make the journey across the continent by easy stages, scattering suffrage oratory and literature through a fruitful line of states east of the Rockies. San Francisco would be the terminus from which city women would ship their horses back by rail.

BOY OBEYED ORDERS GIVEN

Meant Well, but Information Was Not Welcomed by Hotel Manager Just at That Time.

A certain New York hotel manager is one of these nervous men who constantly warn their employes against keeping them in ignorance of any happening around the place. He hired a new bell boy recently, and gave him the usual warning:

"Remember," he warned, "if anything happens around here I'm to be the first person to know about it."

Soon after that he was showing three haughty Daughters of the Confederacy one of the best rooms in the place, when the new bell boy rushed in with his hair on end.

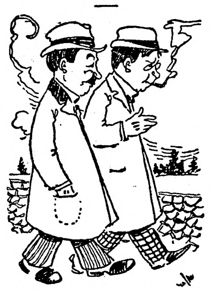
"Something's happened!" he replied.

The three Daughters of the Confederacy turned coldly, and the manager, anxious to get rid of the boy, demanded to know the trouble.

"That old cat down stairs," said the boy, "has just had kittens! What shall we do?"

The manager's suggestion was rough.

HE KNEW.



Smith—Friends are a great consolation.

Jones—Not if you're broke.

Made Him Suspicious.

"Did you ask your girl's father for her hand in marriage?" "I did." "And he refused you. I can tell by the way you look." "No, he didn't. He gave his consent." "Then why the peculiar look you are wearing?" "He was so darned willing."—Houston Post.

His Status.

"Is that druggist well thought of in the community?"

"Sure. Isn't he a pill-er of the church?"

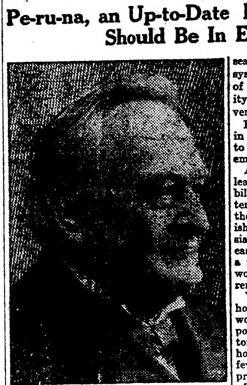
A TONIC LAXATIVE

Pe-ru-na, an Up-to-Date Family Medicine That Should Be In Every Home



S. B. HARTMAN, M. D.

Nearly everybody is obliged more or less to take a laxative. There are of course a few exceptions. A great many people also need occasionally to take a tonic. Probably few households exist that do not make use of tonics and laxatives.

The remedy Peruna is a laxative tonic. It not only operates as a gentle laxative, but also as a tonic.

The benefit derived from such a remedy is a great deal more in the prevention of disease than in the cure. After a person has really become sick, either with an acute or chronic ailment, the rule should be to employ a physician, or some one who can give the case his personal attention. But long before this happens the person will complain of this or that symptom, which is not severe enough to interfere with his regular activities. If at this place before the disease has really gained a foothold in the system, a person was to take a dose or two of a good tonic laxative the great majority of cases of sickness would be prevented.

Peruna is a remedy that should be kept in the house. Its virtue as a preventive to disease is the thing I wish chiefly to emphasize.

A slight condition of constipation may lead to serious sluggishness of the bowels, biliousness, re-absorption of poisonous material and finally sickness. Or apathy of the stomach in which the food is not relished, may gradually lead to atonic dyspepsia or to the acquisition of some acute disease. For either one of these conditions a few doses of the tonic laxative Peruna would set matters right. This is why the remedy should always be kept handy by.

When once the value of Peruna as a household remedy is understood no home would be without it. Cathartics, pills and powders would be discarded. Irritating tonics would be no longer taken. Alcoholic drinks would have no place. With a few doses of Peruna a vigorous appetite is produced and if there be any sluggishness of the bowels their function is gradually restored.

Most laxatives are weakening in their effect. A tonic laxative guards against this weakening effect. Until right living has become so thoroughly established that all medicines are superfluous, Peruna will be needed. It is exactly the remedy that meets numerous necessities of the household. Sold at all drug stores.

Mr. John B. Perkins, 22 Whiting St., Plymouth, Mass., writes: "I think Peruna is a number one medicine. I was troubled with catarrh and bowel complaint. I tried several doctors, but could only find temporary relief. I took Peruna and am glad to say that it cured my catarrh and corrected my bowels."

Pe-ru-na, Man-a-lin and La-cu-pia manufactured by the Pe-ru-na Company, Columbus, Ohio. Sold at all drug stores.

SPECIAL NOTICE:—Many persons inquire for The Old-time Peruna. They want the Peruna that their Fathers and Mothers used to take. The old Peruna is now called Katarno. If your druggist or dealer does not keep it for sale write the Katarno Company, Columbus, Ohio, and they will tell you all about it.

To Pop Corn.

Very often corn will not pop quickly, even over a very hot fire. If you will put the corn to be popped in a sieve and pour cold water over it, not allowing the water to stand on the corn, it will not only pop quickly, but the open kernels will be larger and lighter and more flaky than they otherwise would have been.

Natural Effect.

"Woman is a delusion."

"Yes, and it comes natural to hug our delusions."

Proved.

"Is that dainty flush on Clara's cheeks her own?"

"No; she took it out of sister's box."

Enough to Scare Anybody.

"I had an awful scare last night."

"What happened?"

"My husband had been reading about the war in the Balkans and he mentioned the names of a lot of those Turkish towns in his sleep."

If we were all as good as we advise others to be, heaven would be right here on earth.

After Long Suffering

Women Are Constantly Being Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"Worth mountains of gold," says one woman. Another says, "I would not give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for all the other medicines for women in the world." Still another writes, "I should like to have the merits of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound thrown on the sky with a searchlight so that all suffering women could read and be convinced that there is a remedy for their ills."

We could fill a newspaper ten times the size of this with such quotations taken from the letters we have received from grateful women whose health has been restored and suffering banished by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Why has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound accomplished such a universal success? Why has it lived and thrived and kept on doing its glorious work among the sick women of the world for more than 30 years?

Simply and surely because of its sterling worth. The reason no other medicine has ever approached its success is plainly and simply because there is no other medicine so good for women's ills.

Here are two letters that just came to the writer's desk—only two of thousands, but both tell a comforting story to every suffering woman who will read them—and be guided by them.

FROM MRS. D. H. BROWN.

Iola, Kansas.—"During the Change of Life I was sick for two years. Before I took your medicine I could not bear the weight of my clothes and was bloated very badly. I doctored with three doctors but they did me no good. They said nature must have its way. My sister advised me to take Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and I purchased a bottle. Before it was gone the bloating left me and I was not so sore. I continued taking it until I had taken 12 bottles. Now I am stronger than I have been for years and can do all my work, even the washing. Your medicine is worth its weight in gold. I cannot praise it enough. If more women would take your medicine there would be more healthy women. You may use this letter for the good of others."—Mrs. D. H. BROWN, 809 North Walnut Street, Iola, Kan.

MRS. WILLIAMS SAYS:

Elkhart, Ind.—"I suffered for 14 years from organic inflammation, female weakness, pain and irregularities. The pains in my sides were increased by walking or standing on my feet and I had such awful bearing down feelings, was depressed in spirits and became thin and pale with dull, heavy eyes. I had six doctors from whom I received only temporary relief. I decided to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a fair trial and also the Sanitive Wash. I have now used the remedies for four months and cannot express my thanks for what they have done for me.—Mrs. SADIE WILLIAMS, 455 James Street, Elkhart, Indiana.

Temperate Humanity.

The driver of a brewery wagon stopped at a restaurant where he delivered beer and prepared to water his horses. He had filled a pail from the street hydrant and was about to offer it to the near horse when the command "Put that down" caused him to drop the bucket with a splash. Then a woman plunged a thermometer into the water.

"Too cold by several degrees," she said. "Get a pail of hot water from the restaurant."

The driver mumbled "What for?" but he was awed by the woman's commanding manner and he fetched the hot water as directed.

"Now," she said, "pour some of that could water out and pour hot water into the pail until it registers about 57 degrees. Then water your horses. It is cruel to make a horse drink water colder than that, and every member of the S. P. C. A. that I have any influence with is going to keep an eye on you drivers and see that you temper the water you give to your houres."

What a Funny Teacher.

An east side lad of six summers has a child's faculty for seeing things, often in the way they are not. He came home from school the other day and found his father reading the daily paper.

"Pop," he said, "my teacher don't know nothin'!"

"Why, son, what's the matter now?" asked the father.

"Well," replied the youngster, "she held a big red apple up in front of us this morning and said: 'Children, what is this I have in my hand?'"—Indianapolis News.

MUNYON'S PAW-PAW PILLS

Munyon's Paw-Paw Pills are unlike all other laxatives or cathartics. They coax the liver into activity by gentle methods, they do not scour; they do not gripe; they do not weaken; but they do start all the secretions of the liver and stomach in a way that soon puts these organs in a healthy condition and correct constipation. Munyon's Paw-Paw Pills are a tonic to the stomach, liver and nerves. They invigorate instead of weaken; they enrich the blood instead of impoverishing it; they enable the stomach to get all the nourishment from food that is put into it. Price 25 cents. All Druggists.

The Young Bride's First Discovery.

Their wedding tour had ended, and they entered their new home to settle down to what they hoped to be one long uninterrupted blissful honeymoon.

But alas! the young bride's troubles soon began, when she tried to reduce the cost of living with cheap big can baking powders.

She soon discovered that all she got was a lot for her money, and it was not all baking powder, for the bulk of it was cheap materials which had no leavening power. Such powders will not make light, wholesome food. And because of the absence of leavening gas, it requires from two to three times as much to raise cakes or biscuits as it does of Calumet Baking Powder.

Thus, eventually, the actual cost to you of cheap baking powders is more than Calumet would be.

Cheap baking powders often leave the bread bleached and acid, sometimes yellow and alkaline, and often unpalatable. They are not always of uniform strength and quality.

Now the bride buys Calumet—the perfectly wholesome baking powder, moderate in price, and always uniform and reliable. Calumet keeps indefinitely, makes good cooking easy, and is certainly the most economical after all. TURKS DODGE BLAME

HER ENVOYS TO BE LAST TO QUIT LONDON BY PORTE'S ORDERS.

BLAME MUST BE ON ALLIES

Ottoman Government Anxious to Show Deference to Wishes of Powers—Say Adrianople Can Withstand.

London, Feb. 4.—The porte has ordered the Turkish plenipotentiaries not to leave London until hostilities are resumed and has instructed the army to await the attack before firing a shot.

Why They Tarry.

Thus, the Ottomans, who with the exception of the Montenegrins, are the only delegates left in London, remarked that nobody could accuse them of not having done all that was humanly possible to come to terms. Animated by a humanitarian spirit, they added, Turkey wished to avoid useless carnage and wished also to show deference to the advice of the powers, although Europe had been unfair toward Turkey.

Dr. Daneff, head of the Bulgarian delegation, before leaving the capital, recalled what he said in his first statements on arriving in London, that the Balkan peoples, who had adapted the Monroe doctrine to their peninsula, aspired to become the Americans of Europe. They had inaugurated a policy of sincerity and straightforwardness, as was proved by their frank conduct in the peace conference, where they demanded from the first exactly what they intended to take, against double dealing on the part of the Turks.

Rejects Partial Idea.

Balkan representatives, he said, would not have waited to their own disadvantage so long before resuming hostilities but for the genuine regard which the Balkan kingdom held for the powers. He again rejected the idea that even a small fraction of Adrianople should be retained by Turkey.

Dr. Daneff concluded by saying:

"Turkey should have understood that she must abandon Europe entirely, her permanence there being opposed not only by the allies but by the powers themselves as shown by their collective vote. Turkey has refused to quit peacefully, but will be forced to do so by another war, after which, fully realizing the strength of the Balkan states, she will become their friend."

Assertion Ridiculed.

Osman Nizami Pasha of the Turkish delegation ridiculed the assertion that the allies would be able to storm Adrianople in a few days. He said they were evidently playing on the ignorance of the public. He pointed out that the fortifications on the hills surrounding the town form a circle 25 miles in diameter, within which are other circles equally strong.

In addition the town is protected by such natural defenses as the rivers Arda, Tundja and Maritza, and he declared that the garrison in the fortress could resist an enemy even tenfold superior in numbers, which the allied forces are not.

The plan to take Adrianople by starvation had evidently been abandoned, the Turkish commandant having proved his ability to furnish supplies indefinitely or the fighting men and the civilians within the town.

Middletown, Conn., Feb. 1.—Sportively inclined students at Wesleyan university hereafter will be compelled to find some other diversion during its chapel period than betting on the length of the leader's prayer, as a result of the expulsion of one of the most prominent members of the senior class yesterday on the charge of irreverence to chapel. Morning chapel is held at Wesleyan each week day, and this was a favorite diversion among the upper class men lately.

Has been recommended for over forty years as a remedy for ailments peculiar to women. Thousands of grateful women have testified to its effectiveness. You, too, will find it beneficial. As made up by improved and exact processes, the "Favorite Prescription" is a most efficient remedy for regulating all the womanly functions, correcting displacements, as prolapsus, anteversion and retroversion, overcoming painful periods, toning up the nerves and bringing about a perfect state of health.

This tonic, in liquid form, was devised over 40 years ago for the womanly system, by R. V. Pierce, M. D., and has benefited many thousand women. Now it can also be obtained in tablet form—from dealers in medicine, or send 50 one-cent stamps for a trial box.

Every woman ought to possess Dr. Pierce's great book, the People's Common Sense Medical Adviser, a magnificent thousand-page illustrated volume. It teaches mothers how to care for their children and themselves. It is the best doctor to have in the house in case of emergency. Over half a million copies were sold at $1.50 each, but one free copy in cloth covers will be sent on receipt of 31 one-cent stamps to pay the cost of wrapping and mailing only. Address

A Case In Kind

"I wrote to you about six months ago for your kind advice in regard to my case," writes Mrs. Lizzi White. "At times I was hardly able to be on my feet. I believe I had every pain and ache a woman could have. Had a very bad case of uterine disease. Ovaries were very much diseased and my back was very weak. I suffered a great deal with nervous headaches, in fact I suffered all over. I followed your directions as closely as I could, and was well pleased with the results. I have taken your 'Favorite Prescription' and 'Golden Medical Discovery' for about three months and can now say that my health was never better. I can highly recommend Doctor Pierce's remedies to any woman suffering from female disease, and I do recommend them to every one I see. Have induced several to try your wonderful medicines." Address furnished on request.

The Royalton Banner pertinently remarks:

"Wonder if every one of those senators who voted against woman suffrage classes his wife and daughter as incompetent to judge between right and wrong in matters of public interest. Perhaps they would rather trust to the judgement of the drunken porters and roisterers of their home town.

The Marschalk-O'Neill bill for state aid to settlers in clearing their timber lands seems to have met with a lot of warm backing througout the northern portion of the state. That is as it ought to be, but, in the meantime, are the settlers on the swamp lands to be subject to all kinds of injustices at the hands of drainage contractors and money grasping engineers, which wrongs are made possible by the present iniquitous drainage laws?

The government is just now trying in the Supreme court of the District of Columbia to establish what beer is. The action was started by the pure food and drug board of the department of agriculture, and the complaint alleges that the product in question was misbranded as a "malt and hop brew", but is a product in which other ingredients had been substituted wholly or in part for the malts. Beer is not always as innocent as it looks or tastes.

The legislative correspondent of the Duluth Herald quotes an alleged progressive member of the house, in speaking of the proposition for the recall of judical decisions, as saying: "Somehow some things look different when taken out of their original environment. That proposition looked good to me in the last campaign, but now, somehow, do you know it looks to me an awful lot like moonshine." It always has been pretty easy for hypocritical politicians to change their minds on public questions after they have been elected.

Minnesota's cows and hens earned eighty-three millions of dollars for their owners during the past year, according to a report just issued by Prof. T. L. Haecker, of the Agricultural College at St. Anthony Park. The average individual production per cow is given at $4[illegible],25. for the year. These figures represent the output, not the total production, and it must be taken into account that the farmers, or most of them, retained enough of the dairy products for their home consumption. When this is considered it is safe to say that the average production per cow was at least $50. The point is, that every cow in the state earns her price and her feed every year, and gives her owner the added increase into the bargain. Another very important point is that this part of the state is unexcelled for dairy farming, as is proven by the immense earnings of its creameries in the past dozen years, which represents the time since creameries first made their appearance in this section of the state.

USE OF METALS BY ANCIENTS

Extraction of Gold From Ores on a Large Scale Is Attributed to the Soudan.

Prof. W. Gowland, in his Huxley memorial lecture at the Royal Anthropological institute recently, spoke on the metals in antiquity, and traced the origin of the smelting furnace to the primitive camp fire in which a lump of ore might have been reduced to metal. But until the art of smelting had been invented the use of metals was insufficient to affect to any great extent the old stone agriculture. Professor Gowland traced the earliest metallurgy of copper and iron to western Asia, but said the extraction of gold from its ores on a large scale in the earliest times was attributed to the Soudan.

Egypt produced the first mining map in the world—a map showing a gold mining region in 1350 to 1330 B. C. Lead only became of importance during the supremacy of the Romans in connection with their elaborate systems for the supply and distribution of water and the construction of baths. In Africa the extraction of iron from its ores was carried on at a remote date. The fact that this early African iron smelting was known in Egypt was well shown by the bas relief on a stone now in the Egyptian collection in Florence.—London Letter, New York Sun.

GLASS NEEDED A SPOON.

She was pouring boiling water into a fine thin glass tumbler in which was a piece of lemon peel and two lumps of sugar, also a golden brown liquid which might have been cold tea; crack-crack—and the crystal vessel was in a condition fitting it only for the ash pile.

"Isn't that just too bad that I broke that glass? It spoils the set," was her plaintive comment.

"My dear girl," said the wise caller, "whenever you find it necessary to put any very hot liquid in a delicate glass or china vessel, if you will put the spoon in first such an accident as you have had will be quite impossible."

TO "PENELOPIZE."

The word penelopize has been little used. It refers to the conduct of Penelope, wife of Ulysses, who, according to Greek tradition, killed time during her husband's absence by doing and undoing a piece of work and doing it over and over again; hence penelopize came to mean doing something merely to kill time, or as we sometimes say "marking time." Senator Benton of Missouri once said in a speech, "Diplomacy was still drawing out its lengthened thread—still weaving its long and dilatory web—still penelopizing." The word can be found in some dictionaries, but as far as usage is concerned it is obsolete.

SERIOUS DOUBT.

MERELY SUGGESTED.

Who is Brown Working For?

From the Minneapolis Journal we learn that W. J. Brown, of Thief River Falls, is at St. Paul this week and has appeared before the senate drainage committee to work against certain new drainage laws. Brown is a good worker for the interests he may represent, but, WHO IS HE WORKING FOR? We do not think he represents the settlers of the Mud Lake region, or that he is working merely for the fun of it.

The taxpayers in this territory should get together and send down a good, strong committee to work for their interests, and they should do it at once. They should also write to their representatives in the legislature and urge proper amendments to the present drainage laws.

Risberg Surprise Party

On Saturday night a lot of friends of Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Risberg perpetrated a surprise on them at the Evergreen Hotel. The surprise part of it was the real thing and they were presented with a handsome combination desk and bookcase as a token of the high esteem in which they are held by the community. The crowd attending was easily the biggest ever seen at any social event in Holt and Mr. and Mrs. Risberg were honored guests at a fine oyster supper supplied by the visitors. The affair was planned and carried out as an expression of the pleasure of the people that the Risberg's have returned to Holt to run the Evergreen Hotel, and it was certainly a warm welcome extended to a couple who have always earned the high regard of their neighbors.

For Better Roads

We understand that some of the towns in this part of the county will vote on the question of adopting the contract system for road work and paying road taxes in cash instead of the old, worn out, no good method of working them out. Every town should adopt the cash and contract systems. We know of many places where the change was made years ago, and they would not change back again under any conditions. It is the only way whereby good roads can be secured at a minimum cost in this country, and the only way in which the taxpayers get full value for their road taxes. If you work out your road tax, or loaf it out as most of them do, the country or the individual gets little, if any, permanent benefit. Vote for the change if you have the opportunity.

For Farmers' Elevator

There is quite a strong movement on foot to organize a farmers elevator company here, and the present indications are that the company will be formed in the near future. P. A. Risberg is the leader in the movement and he reports that about forty farmers have already pledged themselves to take stock in the venture. It is probable that a meeting will be called soon to perfect the organization which is heartily favored by a lot of people.

FIRST RESTAURANT IN PARIS

Founded Not Much More Than a Century Ago During Louis XV.'s Time.

A Paris journalist, searching some old records, has made an amusing discovery, the correspondent of the London Express writes. The first restaurant is quite a modern invention. It was founded by an innkeeper named Boulanger during the last years of the reign of Louis XV. Before there were any restaurants, places, that, is where one could order meals a la carte, travelers were obliged to feed at the cabaret, where the customer brought his own food, which was cooked for a fee, and the landlord supplied the wine. There was also the "traiteur," which was the forerunner of the Swiss table d'hote. There, until 1772, meals were served at stated times to a fixed number of people, who, as the old chronicler writes, "were forced to eat according to the landlord's tastes, whether they would be pleased or not, or else go hungry."

After the table d'hote one or two ingenious souls started tables for six and twelve guests, serving different bills of fare at the different tables, and then, a few years later, the restaurant where every man could order what he wished became the fashion. But the restaurant as we know it is little more than a century old.

EDDY WILL SETTLED

SONS ABANDON CLAIMS TO $2,000,000 LEFT TO MOTHER'S CHURCH.

PLAINTIFFS SELL COYPRIGHTS

Get $5,000 for These—Decreed That Most of Money Shall Be Spent to Further Religion.

Boston, Feb. 10.—Litigation over the bequest of $2,000,000 made to the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston by Mrs. Mary Baker G. Eddy, ended when her natural heirs joined with the trustees of the church in proposed decrees entered in the several courts involved.

Coincident with this action, the Massachusetts house concurred with the senate in enabling an act which permits the mother church to accept and use the money for advancement of Christian Science as directed by its founder.

Four Stipulations.

Four stipulations compose the decrees which were entered simultaneously in the courts of Massachusetts and New Hampshire and the federal court for the district of New Hampshire.

In these, George W. Glover of Lead, S. D., and E. J. Foster Eddy of Waterbury, Vt., son and adopted son of Mrs. Eddy, abandoned their suits for a share in the estate and renounced their claims to money left the church.

The trustees, on their part, consent that the administrator shall pay $5,000 for the assignment of the sons' contingent right to renew, in their lifetime, the copyrights on their mother's published works. They further consent that the trustees, holding $175,000 (which is the trust fund portion of the $290,000 settled on them by Mrs. Eddy in 1909 in lieu of their share of the estate), shall not further claim that their rights in that fund were forfeited by their action in subsequent court proceedings.

Two Millions for Church.

Mrs. Eddy died at Newton, Mass., Dec. 4, 1910. Her will, which disposed of an estate of about $2,500,000, left approximately $2,000,000 in trust to the First Church of Christ, Scientist, of Boston. The two sons who, a year before her death had received from Mrs. Eddy $290,000 in satisfaction of all claims against her estate, attacked the will of January, 1911, invoking statutes of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, which limit bequests to churches to sums returning annual incomes of not more than $5,000 and $2,000 in the respective states. Eventually, the question of the validity of the will reached the supreme courts of both states.

In New Hampshire the will was upheld. The supreme court of Massachusetts ruled that the $2,000,000 bequest could not be received by the mother church, but, at the same time, declared that the will of the benefactor should be respected.

End of Suit a Surprise.

Concord, N. H.—General Frank S. Streetor, who represented the Christian Science church in the agreement for the discontinuance of the action brought to break the will of Mrs. Eddy, said:

"In view of the denunciatory allegations in the court pleadings of Mrs. Eddy's two sons against her, her religion and the officials of her church, the recent proposal of their counsel to end that litigation came to us as an agreeable surprise."

MAY ATTEMPT TO RETALIATE

Republicans Likely to Oppose Wilson Nominations to Even Score With Democrats.

Washington, Feb. 10.—Opposition of Democratic senators to the confirmation of President Taft's 1,500 pending nominations has brought some Republican senators into the position of threatening retaliation after the Democrats come into power on March 4.

The proposal is being discussed in the Republican cloakrooms, and it is learned, has been broached in the Republican caucus and the executive sessions of the senate. Senator William Alden Smith of Michigan was the principal speaker in each instance.

In the caucus, Senator Smith advocated a policy of obstruction to all nominations by Presiednt Wilson. He declared he would be willing to go so far as to oppose the cabinet nominations. In one of the executive sessions Mr. Smith told the Democratic senators they were pursuing a course which might react upon them.

Farewell Dinner for Cannon.

Washington, Feb. 10.—President Taft will attend the farewell dinner to "Uncle Joe" Cannon here Feb. 15. Friends of the veteran of 40 years in congress, who was retired to private life in last fall's Democratic landslide, are planning to send him home with a farewell celebration that will be a rouser.

Navy Paymaster Is Dismissed.

Washington, Feb. 10—Assistant Paymaster Harry H. Palmer of the navy, who recently was tried and convicted by general court martial at Philadelphia, has been dismissed from the service. He was found guilty of financial irregularities, rendering false returns, and making false statements to a naval examining board for promotion, negligence and inefficient performance of duty and failure to pay his debts. Assistant Paymaster Palmer's last duty was on the Transport Prairie.

MORE POLICE GRAFT TESTIMONY

GAMBLER SAYS HE PAID $50,000 "HUSH MONEY."

Every Squad But One for 17 Years Exacted Toll, He Declares.

New York, Feb. 10.—Herman Rosenthal's one-time partner in gambling has picked up the broken threads of Rosenthal's story and told the aldermanic committee investigating graft, a tale of money paid for police protection eclipsing that of Jack Rose, Charles Becker's collector.

For 17 years, James Purcell said, he had paid for the privilege of running a gambling house, making a handbook or conducting a poolroom. In all, he gave the police more than $50,000, he declared, during this period.

Former Sheriff Harvey of Queen's county, Police Inspector McLaughlin, half a dozen police captains, including a brother-in-law of Charles F. Murphy, the Tammany leader, and scores of ward heelers and policemen—some now on the force, others off—were among the men who got the money, he said.

Orders from Murphy.

Once, he said, orders came "indirectly" from Murphy himself to close up. He moved at once. Charles Becker, now in the death house at Sing Sing for the murder of Rosenthal, got $350 from him for "fixing" the evidence against him and five others taken in a raid Becker made on his gambling house, Purcell declared. Becker was then head of the "strong arm" squad for the suppression of gambling.

"I have paid money to every squad that was ever detailed to headquarters to suppress gambling, except one," Purcell testified. "They all took it except Costigan's. Costigan was on the level."

Costigan was referred to during the first investigation of the Rosenthal case as the "honest policeman."

In return for this protection money, Purcell said, the police generally let him alone. When they had to act on complaints from the outside, they "tipped him off," he declared. He always moved to another house when thus informed. For a while, he moved every day.

Once he defied the police. For nine months, when he had Jack McAuliffe, former lightweight champion, for a partner, they ran a gambling house on the upper East Side without making the weekly payments to collectors. The police stationed two men at the door of his establishment, he declared, to warn all customers that it was a gambling house.

"But Jack beat that scheme," he said. "If the two policemen forgot to talk or talked nice, he gave them $5 apiece a day. If they did not, they got no money. They generally talked nice."

February Opens Auspiciously.

New York, Feb. 10.—Bradstreet's review of trade says:

Trade is expanding, visiting buyers are increasing their purchases as the season progresses and in consequence February opens auspiciously. Spring shipments are going forward in volume; retail dealers continue to press jobbers for goods; colder weather has imparted zest to final distribution; industrial operations are as active as heretofore; winter wheat is in good shape; money is in active demand and merchants display no particular apprehension over the tariff.

Coal Miners Shoot Up Town.

Charlestown, W. Va., Feb. 8.—Conditions are critical, in Paint and Cabin Creeks, Kanakha county, where a coal strike has been on over a year. A Chesapeake and Ohio passenger train was shot up late last night; the town of Mucklow, W. Va., was riddled with bullets, and a physician with a dying man, driving through the district, was fired upon. When the physician with his patient arrived at a hospital the patient was dead. At midnight striking miners were gathering from Paint and Cabin Creeks in the vicinity of Mucklow.

Young Mrs. Belmont says she married the millionaire's son in Jersey City Nov. 21, 1912.

To Protect Water Power.

Washington, Feb. 10.—That conservation of American water power does not mean its reservation, but does mean its protection against control by a "favored few" was the assertion of Senator Burton in the conclusion of his speech in favor of the Connecticut river dam bill, giving the government the right to control and regulate a power plant at Windsor Mills, Conn.

McVeagh Replies to Criticism.

Washington, Feb. 10.—Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh, in a letter to Representative Carter Glass of the house banking and currency committee, which is investigating treasury order No. 5, criticised on the ground that it would result in the accumulation of $200,000,000 a year in gold in the New York banks from customs receipts, declare that the new plan of handling receipts and disbursements of the government does not involve an increase in the amount of bank deposits to any appreciable extent.

ROCKEFELLER SICK

HEARING IS ABRUPTLY TERMINATED BY A SPASM OF THE THROAT.

4 UNIMPORTANT QUESTIONS

Physician Calls Halt When These are Answered—Visit to Jekyl Island is for Naught.

Jekyl Island, Ga., Feb. 10.—A spasm of the throat that left William Rockefeller a strangling, trembling old man, on the verge of nervous collapse, abruptly terminated his examination by Chairman Pujo and Counsel Samuel Untermyer of the house money trust committee here.

Mr. Rockefeller was asked just four questions, each practically immaterial, before the attack forced a conclusion of the hearing.

With Committee 12 Minutes.

The aged Standard Oil magnate was closeted with the committeemen for only 12 minutes. At the end of the time he was assisted in to his couch by Dr. Walter F. Chappelle, who declared his patient exhausted.

In Mr. Rockefeller's suite in an apartment house on the isolated island that forms the estate of the exclusive millionaire's club of Jekyl island, the 72-year-old Standard Oil magnate submitted to the questions. There ended the six months' search of the government process servers who sought the reluctant witness from New York to the Bahamas and lay siege to his New York home.

The net result of the examination, so far as the money trust investigation was concerned, added practically nothing of value to the record. It did demonstrate to the satisfaction of Mr. Untermyer and Mr. Pujo that Mr. Rockefeller was hardly a fit subject physically for a gruelling examination on the details of his financial career.

Members of the Jekyl Island club and Dr. Walter F. Chappelle shook their heads doubtfully when asked about Mr. Rockefeller's physical condition.

"Mr. Rockefeller is in a very serious state," the doctor said.

New Growth Formed.

He added that a new growth of a malignant nature had formed in Mr. Rockefeller's throat and that serious developments were to be expected at any time.

The examination was delayed for a time by a conference between counsel for the prospective witness and Mr. Untermyer, but the inquisitors finally were ushered into a large drawing room where Mr. Rockefeller, bent and shaking, sat in a large arm chair beside a glass topped table.

Helen Keller Speaks Publicly.

New York, Feb. 7.—Helen Keller, born deaf, dumb and blind, has almost fully surmounted one of her handicaps and is to make her first public appearance on the lecture platform at a socialistic meeting in Montclair, N. J., tonight. Although Miss Keller has been able to speak to a certain extent during the past year, the development of her voice under the care of a singing teacher has now reached the stage where her words will carry in an auditorium.

TURKS ARE REPULSED AGAIN

DRIVEN BACK IN ATTACK ON BULGARIANS BEFORE BULAIR.

Mussulman's Campaign on Gallipoli Peninsula Meets with Disaster.

Sofia, Feb. 11.—An official statement just issued says the Turks on Saturday took the offensive against the Bulgarians before Bulair, in the Gallipoli peninsula. After a fierce engagement, lasting several hours, the Bulgarians repulsed the Turks, pursuing them to the Bulair forts. Many wounded were left on the field.

Turkish prisoners say six divisions took part in the movement. At nightfall the Turks made another attempt down the coast, where 20 vessels had made their appearance. The landing parties from the ships were attacked by the Bulgarians, who inflicted heavy losses. The Turkish vessels thereupon sailed away.

All attempts of the Turks to assume the offensive at Tchatalja have been checked. They essayed to land troops at Podima, to the northeast of Istrandia, on the Black sea, but were beaten, leaving 50 dead.

The bombardment of Adrianople continues, with uniform success. Deserters say people within the invested city are fleeing from one section to another to avoid the Bulgarian shells.

It is stated also that the Bulgarians repulsed a sortie on the east front of Adrianople. Prince Ferdinand has left Demotika for Dedeagatch.

Wilson's Secretary Honored.

Washington, Feb. 10.—Joseph P. Tumulty, secretary to Governor Wilson and chosen by the president-elect as his secretary in the White House, was the guest of honor at a reception given him by the National Press club. Mr. Tumulty promised to have "a great deal to say to the correspondents a little later." Joseph R. Wilson of Nashville, Tenn., brother of the president-elect, accompanied Mr. Tumulty to the club.

Students Battle With Guards.

Ann Arbor, Mich., Feb. 10.—In a battle between 400 university students and campus deputies placed to guard Waterman gymnasium at the junior ball, four students and three deputies were badly beaten with clubs, gas pipes and rocks, while eighteen of the mob were arrested. The battle was the direct result of the guards refusing to let the students come into the gymnasium after midnight, as has been customary in former years.

Vanni Marcoux Badly Injured.

Boston, Feb. 10.—Vannia Marcoux, baritone of the Boston Opera company, was knocked unconscious when he was struck by the curtain as it was making its final drop at the opera house.

Miners Take Strike Fields.

Charleston, W. Va., Feb. 10.—No troops have been sent by Governor Glasscock into the Kanawha coal strike district. Armed miners have taken possession of the strike territory, according to reports. During the afternoon railroad crews refused to take trains into the coal fields. The last telegraph wire to the strike territory has been cut. Uneasiness exists at Eskdale, Mucklow and Kayford. A large number of persons are leaving the district.

The STOLEN SINGER

by MARTHA BELLINGER

COPYRIGHT 1911 THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY

SYNOPSIS.

Agatha Redmond, opera singer, starting for an auto drive in New York, finds a stranger sent as her chauffeur. Leaving the car, she goes into the park to read the will of an old friend of her mother, who has left her property. There she is accosted by a stranger, who follows her to the auto, climbs in and chloroforms her. James Hambleton of Lynn, Mass., witnesses the abduction of Agatha Redmond. Hambleton sees Agatha forcibly taken aboard a yacht. He secures a tug and when near the yacht drops overboard. Aleck Van Camp, friend of Hambleton, had an appointment with him. Not meeting Hambleton, he makes a call upon friends, Madame and Miss Melanie Reynier. He proposes to the latter and is refused. Melanie explains that she is of high birth in a German principality, from which she had fled to escape an unwished marriage. The three arrange a coast trip on Van Camp's yacht, the Sea Gull. Hambleton wakes up on board the Jeanne D'Arc, the yacht on which is Agatha Redmond. His clothes and money belt have been taken from him. He meets a man who introduces himself as Monsieur Chatelard, who is Agatha's abductor. They fight, but are interrupted by the threatened sinking of the vessel.

CHAPTER VII—Continued.

There followed hours of superhuman struggle to save the Jeanne D'Arc. Her crew, sufficient in ordinary weather, was too small to cope with the storm and the leaking ship. Ballast had to be shifted or flung overboard. Repairs had to be worked incessantly. It transpired that the yacht had gone far out of her course during the fog the night before, and had tried to turn inshore, even before the leak was discovered. No one knew what waters they were that lashed so furiously about the disabled craft. The storm overhead had abated, but the rage of the sea was unquelled. Before long the engine was stopped by the rising water, and then the hand pumps were used. There was some hope that the leak had been discovered and at least partly repaired. The captain thought that, if carefully managed, the yacht might hold till daylight.

Jimmy joined the gang and worked like a trojan, helping wherever a man was needed, shifting ballast, untackling the boats, handling the pump. It was at the pump that he found himself some time during the night, working endlessly, it seemed. Not once had he lost sight of the real purpose of his presence on the yacht. If Agatha Redmond were aboard the unlucky vessel—and he had moments of curious perplexity about it—he was there to watch for her safety. He pictured her sitting somewhere in the endangered vessel. She could not but be terrified at her predicament. Whether shipwreck or abduction threatened her, she must feel that she had indeed fallen into the hands of her enemies. He worked his turn at the pump, then made up his mind to risk no further delay, but to search the ship's cabins. She was in one of them, he believed; frightened she must be, possibly ill. He had done all that the furthest stretch of duty could demand in assistance to the ship. He would find Agatha Redmond at any cost, if she were aboard the Jeanne D'Arc. Again he thought to himself that he was glad he was there. Whatever purpose her enemies had, he alone was on her side, he alone could do something to save her.

It was now long past midnight, but not pitch dark either on deck or on the sea. The electric lights had gone out long before, but lanterns had been swung here and there from the deck fixtures. As Jimmy came up, he thought the men were preparing to lower the boats, but when he asked about it in his difficult French, the sailor shook his head. There were more people about than he supposed the yacht carried; several seamen, three or four other men, and a fat woman sitting apathetically on a pile of rope. He went from group to group, and from end to end of the yacht, looking for one woman's face and figure. He saw Monsieur Chatelard, examining one of the boats. He ran down the saloon stairway, determined to search the cabins before he gave up his quest. One moment he prayed that the words of Chatelard might be true, and that she had never been aboard the yacht; the next moment he prayed he might find her behind the next closed door.

As James searched below deck, a house palatial disclosed itself, even in the dim light of the little lanterns. Cabins roomy and comfortable, furnishings of exquisite taste, all the paraphernalia of the cultured and the rich were there. Some of the cabin doors were standing open, and none was locked. Jimmy beat on them, called from room to room, finding nothing. Every human occupant was gone. Sick at heart, he again rushed on deck. Was he mistaken after all? Or had they hidden her in some secret part of the ship where he could not find her?

When Jimmy got back to the deck he saw that the groups had gathered on the port side. Sharp orders were being given. He crowded to the railing, straining his eyes to see, and found that they were transferring the ship's company to the boats. A rope ladder swung from the deck to a boat beneath, which bobbed like a cork beside the big, plunging yacht. Two people were in the boat, a sailor standing at the bow, and a large muffled figure of a woman sitting in the stern. Jimmy at once knew her to be the apathetic fat woman he had seen a few minutes before on deck. His eyes searched the company crowded about the top of the rope ladder, and suddenly his heart leaped. There she was, at the edge of the deck, waiting for the captain to give the word for her to descend to the boat below. As Jimmy's eyes grew accustomed to the darkness, he saw her more and more plainly, a pale face framed in a dark hood, a tall, cloaked figure waiting calmly to obey the word from the superior officer.

It was the third time Jimmy had seen her, but he felt as if he had found one dearer than himself. His eyes dwelt on her. She was not terrified; her nerves were not shaken. "I am ready," she said, turning to the captain. It was the same fine, free voice, suggesting—Oh, what did it not suggest! Never this dark, wild night of danger! Jimmy thrilled to it again as he had thrilled to it once before. He waved jubilant hands. "Agatha Redmond!" he called, across the space and heads that divided them.

Whether she heard his call he did not know. At that moment the word was given, and she turned an almost smiling face to the captain in reply. She knelt to the deck and got footing on the slippery rope. Men above held it and helped as best they could, while the sailor below waited to receive her into the little boat. She was steady and quick as a woman in such a perilous position could be. As she descended, the rowboat, insecurely held to the Jeanne D'Arc, slid sternward a few feet; and while she waited in midair for the boat to be brought up again, the Jeanne D'Arc gave a mighty plunge. The captain shouted from the deck, a sailor yelled, then another; the dipping sea tossed the yacht so that for an instant the boat below and the woman on the ladder were hidden from Jim's view. He climbed over the rail and edged along the narrow margin of the deck until he was a few feet nearer the rope, his heart thumping with fear of calamity.

And even as the thought came, the thing happened. The wrenching of the ropes, insecurity of their fastenings, some blunder on the part of the seamen—whatever it was, the rope loosened like a filament of gauze, and, with its precious burden, dropped into the angry water. Before a breath could be drawn, the black waves churned over her head.

As, for the second time, Jim saw disaster engulf the Vision that had such power over him, he was seized by a cold numbness.

"Oh, you brutes!" he groaned aloud; but his groan had scarcely escaped him when he heard loud altercation among the men, and in a moment, the usual tones of Monsieur Chatelard commanding:

"Never mind! Quick with the boat on the other side!"

The seamen rushed to the opposite side, now impatient to make the boats. In the fear that was growing momently upon the men, there was no one to give a thought to the vanished woman. Jimmy clung to the rail for a second, peering over the water. With a cry of gladness he saw her pale face rise to the surface of the water several feet away and toward the bow.

"Keep up a second! It's all right!" he shouted. Quick as thought he snatched a life preserver from its place on the rail, and ran forward. He called thrice, "Keep up, I'm coming!" then threw the cork swiftly and accurately to the very spot where she floated. A second longer he watched, to see if she gained it. It seemed that she did, and yet something was wrong. She was not able to right herself immediately in the water, but floundered helplessly. Jimmy knew that her clothes were hampering her, or else that the rope ladder had entangled her feet.

He turned and got his balance on the narrow ledge, pointed his hands high above his head, and took a good breath. Then he dove toward the floating face. When he came to the surface she was there, not ten strokes away. He swam to her, placed firm hands under her arms, and steadied her while she cleared her feet from the entangling rope.

"Thank God!" he breathed. "I'll save you yet!"

CHAPTER VIII.

On the Breast of the Sea.

"Can you keep afloat in this roughness?"

"I think so, now that I have the life preserver. But the rope scared me for a minute. It got wound about my feet."

"I thought so. But we are drifting away from the boats, and should swim back as fast as we can. Can you swim?"

"Yes; better when I get rid of this cloak. Which way is the yacht? I've lost my bearings."

"Behind us over there. Put your hand on my shoulder and I'll take you along until you get your breath. So!"

The girl obeyed implicitly, "as if she were a good, biddable child," thought Jim. There was none of the terrified clutching at a rescuer which sometimes causes disaster to two instead of one. Miss Redmond was badly shocked, it may be; but she was far from being in a panic.

"Now for the boat. Can you swim a little faster? They'll surely come back to pick us up," said Jim, with an assumption of confidence that he did not feel. They could hear voices from the yacht, and could follow, partially, what was going on. Miss Redmond cast loose her cloak, put a hand on Jim's shoulder, and together they swam nearer. "Ahoy!" shouted Jim. "Give us a hand!" But the boat with the large woman in it had put about to the other side of the yacht. "Ahoy! This way!" shouted Jim. "Throw us a rope!" he cried; but if any of the seamen of the Jeanne D'Arc heard, they paid no heed.

"Come this way," said Jim to his companion. "We'll catch them on the other side of the yacht."

"I can't swim much in all these clothes," said Agatha.

"Never mind, then. Hold on to the life preserver and to me, and we'll make it all right." On the crests of the swelling waves they swam round the dark hulk of the vessel, and heard plainly the clamor of the men as they embarked in the small boats. Two of them seemed to be fastened together, raftlike, on the starboard side of the yacht, and were quickly filled with men. Prayers and curses were audible, with the loose, wild inflexion of the man who is in the clutch of an overmastering fear. As long as there had been work for them to do on the ship, they had done it, though sullenly; they had even controlled themselves until the attempt was made to place the two women in safety. But after that their self-restraint vanished. The orders of the officers were unheeded; the men leaped and scrambled and slid into the boats, and in a minute more they had cut loose from the Jeanne D'Arc.

James dimly perceived that the boats were moving away from them into the darkness. Then he called, and called again, redoubling his speed in swimming; but only the beat of the oars came back over the water. The heart in him stood still with an unacknowledged fear. Was it possible they were absolutely leaving them behind? Surely there were other boats. He raised his voice and called again and again. At last one voice, careless and brutal, called back something in reply. Jim turned questioning eyes to the girl beside him, whose pale face was discernible on the dark water.

"He says the boats are all full."

"Then we must hurry and make for the yacht. Where is she?"

The Jeanne D'Arc had slipped away from them into the darkness.

"She was this way, I thought. Yes, I am sure," said Agatha, pointing into the night. But though they swam that way, they did not come upon her. They turned a little, and then turned again, and presently they lost every sense of direction.

In all his life Jim was never again destined to go through so black an hour as that which followed the abandonment of the Jeanne D'Arc. His courage left him, and his spirit sank to that leaden, choking abyss where lights did not exist. Since the immediate object of saving the ship, for which he had worked as hard as any other, had been given up, the next in importance was to save the woman who, for some mysterious reason, had been aboard. It was beyond his power of imagination to suppose that any other motive of action could possibly prevail, even among her enemies. That they should leave her to drown, while they themselves fled to comparative safety in a boat, was more than he could believe.

"Surely they do not mean it; they must return, for you, at least."

The girl beside him knew better, but she was conscious of the paralyzing despair of her companion's heart, and made a show of being cheerful.

"When they find they are safe they may think of us," she said. "But the men were already crazed with fear, even before the leak was discovered. One of their mates on the voyage over was a fortune-teller, and he prophesied danger to them all on their next trip. After they had come into port, the fortune-teller himself died. And who can blame them for their fear? They are all superstitious; and as no one ever regarded their fears, now they have no regard for anybody's feelings but their own."

"But we are in the middle of the Atlantic, no one knows where. We may drift for days—we may starve—the Lord only knows what will happen to us!"

Agatha, who had been floating, swam a little nearer and laid her hand on Jim's shoulder, until he looked into her face. It was full of strength and brightness.

"'The sea is His also,'" she quoted gently. "Besides, we may get picked up," she went on. "I'm very well off, for my part, as you see. Can swim or rest floating, thanks to this blessed cork thing, and not at all hurt by the fall from the rope. But I must get rid of my shoes and some of my clothes, if I have to swim."

It is awkward to kick off one's shoes and divest oneself of unnecessary clothing in the water, and Agatha laughed at herself as she did it. "Not exactly a bathing suit, but this one black skirt will have to do. The others must go. It was my skirts that caused the mischief with the rope at first. And I was scared!"

"You had a right to be." Jim helped her keep afloat, and presently he saw that, freed from the entanglement of so many clothes, she was as much at home in the water as he. Suddenly she turned to him, caught by some recollection that almost eluded her.

"I don't think we are anywhere near the middle of the Atlantic," she said thoughtfully. James was silent, eating the bitter bread of despair, in spite of the woman's brave wish to comfort him. They were swimming slowly as they talked, still hoping to reach the yacht. They rose on the breast of the waves, paused now and then till a quieter moment came, and always kept near each other in the pale blue darkness.

"Old Sophie said something—that some one had tampered with the wheel, I think. At any rate, she said we'd never get far from shore with this crew."

James considered the case. "But even suppose we are within a mile or two, say, of the shore, could you ever swim two miles in this heavy sea?"

"It is growing calmer every minute. See, I can do very well, even swimming alone. It must be near morning, too, and that's always a good thing." There was the shadow of a laugh in her voice.

"Morning? That depends," growled Jim. He was being soothed in spite of himself, and in spite of the direfulness of their situation. But bad as the situation was, and would be in any case, he could not deny the proposition that morning and daylight would make it better.

"But aren't you tired already? You must be." James turned closer to her, trying to read her face. "It was a long night of anxiety, even before we left the boat. Weren't you frightened?"

"Yes, of course; but I've been getting used to frights of late, if one can get used to them." Again there was the laugh in her voice, under all its seriousness, even when she added: "I'm not sure that this isn't safer than being on board the Jeanne D'Arc, after all!"

It was characteristic of James that he forbode to take advantage of the opening this speech offered. The possible reason of her abduction, her treatment on board the yacht, her relation to Monsieur Chatelard—it was all a mystery, but he could not, at that moment, seek to solve it. Her remark remained unanswered for a little time; at last he said: "Then the Jeanne D'Arc must have been pretty bad."

"It was," she said simply.

Jim wondered whether she knew more about the crime of which she was the victim than he knew, or if she had discovered aught concerning it while she was a prisoner on the yacht. Granting that her person was so valuable that a man of Monsieur Chatelard's caliber would commit a crime to get possession of it, why should he have abandoned her when there was plainly some chance of safety in the boats? He could not conceive of Monsieur Chatelard's risking his neck in an affair of gallantry; cupidity alone would account for his part in the drama. James went over and over the situation, as far as he understood it, but he did none of his thinking aloud. It flashed on his mind that Miss Redmond must already have separated him, in her thoughts, from the other people on the yacht; though perhaps her trust was instinctive, arising from her own need of help. How could she know that he had risked his neck twice, now, to follow the Vision?

Swimming slowly, with Agatha's hand at times on his shoulder, James turned his mind sharply to a consideration of their present position. They had been alternately swimming and floating, hoping to come upon the yacht. The darkness of the night was penetrable, so that they could see a fairly large circle of water about them, but there was no shadow of the Jeanne D'Arc. Save for the sunning surge of the waters, all was silence. The pale forerunners of dawn had appeared. Their swim after the boats of the Jeanne D'Arc had warmed their blood, so that for a while they were not conscious of the chill of the water. But as the minutes lengthened, one by one, fatigue and cold numbed their bodies. It was a test of endurance for a strong man; as for the girl, Jim wondered at her strength and courage. She swam superbly, wtih unhurried, steady strokes. If she grew chatteringly cold, she would start into a vigorous swim, shoulder to shoulder with James. If she lost her breath with the hard exercise, she would take his hand, "so as not to lose you," she would say, and rest on the breast of the waves. The wind dropped and the sea grew quiet, so that they were no more cruelly buffeted, but rocked up and down on its heaving bosom.

Once, while they were "resting" on the water, Agatha broke a long silence with, "I wonder—" but did not at once say what she wondered at. Jim said nothing, but she knew he was waiting and listening.

"Suppose this should be the Great Gateway," she said at last, very lowly, but quite cheerfully and naturally. "I am wondering what there is beyond."

"I've often wondered, too," said Jim.

"I've sometimes thought, and I've said it, too, that I was crazy to die, just to see what happens," Agatha went on, laughing a little at her own memories. "But I find I'm not at all eager for it, now, when it would be so easy to go under and not come up again. Are you?"

"No, I've never felt eager to die; least of all, now."

Agatha was silent a while.

"What do you think death means? Shall we be we tomorrow, say, provided we can't keep afloat?" she asked by and by.

"Why, yes, I think so," said Jim. "I don't know why or how, but I guess we go on somewhere; and I rather think our best moments here—our moments of happiness or heroism, if we ever have any—are going to be the regular thing." Jim laughed a little, partly at his own lame ending, and partly because he felt Agatha's hand closing more tightly over his. He didn't want her to get blue just yet, after her brave fight.

But Agatha wasn't blue. She answered thoughtfully: "That isn't a bad idea," and then cheerfully turned to a consideration of the possibilities of a rescue at dawn.

James had evolved a plan to wait till enough light came to enable them to reach the Jeanne D'Arc, if she was still afloat; then to climb aboard and hunt for provisions and life preservers or something to use for a raft. If he could do this, then they would be in a somewhat better plight, at least for a time. He prayed that the Jeanne D'Arc might still be afloat.

The two talked little, leaving silences between them full of wonder. The details of life, the ordinary personalities, were blotted out. Without explanation or speech of any kind, they understood each other. They were not, in this hour, members of a complex and artificial society; they were not even man and woman; they were two souls stripped of everything but the need for fortitude and sweetness.

At last came the dawn. Slowly the blue curtain of night lifted, lifted, until it became the blue curtain of sky, endlessly far away and far above. A twinkling star looked down on the cup of ocean, glimmered a moment and was gone. The light strengthened. A pearly, iridescent quiver came upon the waters, repeating itself wave after wave, and heralded the coming of the Lord Sun over the great murmuring sea. As the light grew, they could see a constantly widening circle of ocean, of which they were the center. As they rose and fell with the waves, the horizon fell and rose to their vision, dim and undefined. Hand in hand they floated in vaporous silver.

"The day has come at last, thank God!" breathed James.

"Yes, thank God!" answered the girl.

"Are you very cold?"

"The sun will soon warm us."

"Where did you learn to swim?"

"In England, mostly at the Isle of Wight, but I'm not half such a dolphin as you are."

"Oh, well, boys have to swim, you know, and I was a boy once," Jim answered awkwardly. Presently he asked, and his voice was full of awe: "Have you ever seen the dawn—a dawn like this—before?"

"Never one like this," she whispered.

Another Name for Sunlight.

Insects are often susceptible to ultra violet light (which is, of course, a component of sunlight), as experiments by L. Raybaud have recently shown, this fact perhaps explaining the aversion of some species to strong sunlight. In the rays from a mercury vapor lamp, such creatures as snails, houseflies, and tadpoles soon became torpid, and in the course of a few hours were quite dead. Young grasshoppers perished in about two days. Adult grasshoppers showed no apparent injury after a week's exposure, and spiders and beetles were unaffected.

"What kind's that?"

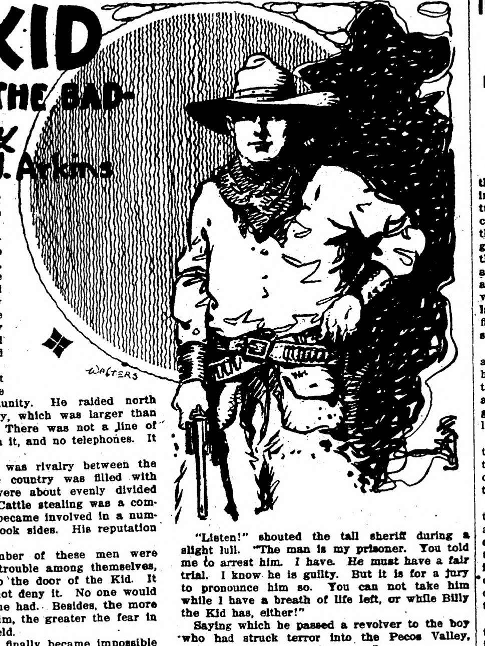
BILLY THE KID

THE MOST FAMOUS OF THE BAD-MEN OF THE WEST

by Frank J. Arkins

© BY THE RIDGWAY CO.



A HOWLING mob of fortune-hunters crowded into Silver City, New Mexico, in the seventies. The uncovering of mineral wealth was beset with great danger. The Apaches were on the war-path. It was hazardous to travel in the country without an escort, but the magnet of wealth in the mines drew men to the scene notwithstanding. In the citizenship of the community there were rough men, for the early days were typical of those of other mining-camps isolated in the mountains and distant from civilization.

In that community there lived a boy of seventeen years of age, respected and loved by all. He was a favorite among the young men and considered a model youth by the old. He was gentle as a child. His face was delicately molded, his skin as fair as a girl's, his hands small and fingers tapering. Lithe, graceful, self-reliant, he gave every promise of an honorable career.

This boy—William H. Bonney—was employed in a local store and was considered a most accommodating clerk. The gruff community was convulsed with horror and dumfounded with astonishment one afternoon when the news spread like wildfire that Bonney had hacked a man to death with a butcher-knife and was fleeing for his life on the back of a stolen horse.

The murder was particularly atrocious. It was the result of an altercation in which young Bonney was crossed. Prior to this the boy had never been questioned. In an instant he was transformed into a demon, within a few minutes he had added theft to murder, and in seeking a place of safety left behind him a trail as broad as though he were following a macadam road.

At the point of a revolver he compelled strangers to exchange horses with him, seized the best mounts at the various ranches along his way and spread consternation wherever he went. He followed the Mimbres river toward Deming, pursued by a posse from Silver City. Closely pressed, he escaped eastward over the Oregon mountains, when it was thought he was headed for Mexico.

The Start of a Bad Man's Trail.

A western town was never more surprised. The majority of the people still defended him; there was some reason, his friends declared, for his strange act. But as news came of the way he was striking terror in the Valley of the Pecos where the roughest men in the southwest lived, the mind of the public was changed. From that time on his murderous exploits filled the hearts of men with fear. The boy's name in western history became forever after Billy the Kid. His name of Bonney is all but forgotten. As the Kid, he stands as one of the great historical figures of the cow country, one of the worst youths that ever lived, prince of bad men, the youngest bad man of all.

His appearance among the prospectors and amid the mining camps of the Oregon mountains was electrical. Here he conceived the idea that to evade arrest he must fight his way to the front single-handed. He boldly traded horses, obtained credit, bought supplies, because he could shoot straight with a revolver and had threatened the lives of a number of men. Then with all dispatch he pushed on to the Valley of the Pecos. This was the scene of the boy's exploits in the taking of human life.

The Pecos Valley was filled with men who had been driven out of Texas by the Rangers, and Billy the Kid's association with these men developed his mania for shedding blood. In his first altercation he realized that it was his life or the other man's. The fact that he was quick with a gun made him feared. He became embittered against one of the stockmen immediately upon his arrival in the valley.

"I'll make this valley too hot for him and dangerous to his punchers," said the boy.

At once he commenced to use this man's cowboys as targets to practice on. He began a campaign that drew upon him the enmity of everybody. The murder of these innocent men, purely to gratify a spite against their employer, made him a leader among the bands of armed thugs of the region. He had at a bound become a celebrity, and every group of bad men wanted to claim him. But the Kid would have none of that. By degrees he gathered a band of his own.

How Many Men Did He Kill?

The Kid killed more men, wantonly and for sheer love of murder, than any other man of whom there is a record in the west. It will never be known just how many he assassinatetd. He was a butcher who took delight in slaying the defenseless. He knew no pangs of conscience. He had not one single redeeming trait. He would murder a friend as quickly as an enemy.

He thought nothing of appearing before a cook in charge of a "chuck" wagon, on a lonely desert range, ask for something to eat, compliment the man upon the quality of the food he had prepared, with apparent gratitude. He would ask him, as if the idea had suddenly popped into his head, whether he was an officer—or had been. Then, as though in doubt, he would shoot him in his tracks. This is no exaggeration. A man whom he left for dead, and who survived long enough to tel the story, was authority for the statement, shortly after his arrival on the Pecos river.

The boy was a terror before whom everybody fled. He rode the fastest horses, he helped himself to the best there was in every community he visited, wiggled out of any number of tight places, and shot his way to freedom a dozen times.

Shortly after his arrival in the valley, he was persuaded, because of his reputation as a bad man, to assist in the arrest of three men charged with murder. They were captured without the firing of a shot, placed on horses, ironed and started jailward. To the deputy sheriff, who with him followed the prisoners across a long, dusty sand plain, he turned suddenly and said,

"Let's kill those fellows."

"Why? They haven't done anything to us."

"They're guilty anyway, and we'll just save the county expense."

"No, Billy, they have not given us a chance to shoot at them—they have not tried to escape."

The deputy tried to argue with him, for he could see the light of murder dancing in the fellow's eyes.

The Kid rode forward, compelling the officer to do likewise, and, according to the story told, shot all three men. The deputy spurred his pony, the Kid after him. They exchanged shots, and the officer escaped with a few wounds.

From that time on it was dangerous for the Kid to enter a community. He raided north through Lincoln county, which was larger than many eastern states. There was not a line of railway or telegraph in it, and no telephones. It was easy to get away.

At that time there was rivalry between the different outfits. The country was filled with bad men, and they were about evenly divided among the cowmen. Cattle stealing was a common thing. The Kid became involved in a number of rows, and he took sides. His reputation as a "killer" grew.

Undoubtedly a number of these men were killed as a result of trouble among themselves, and the killing laid to the door of the Kid. It was easy. He could not deny it. No one would have believed him if he had. Besides, the more murders credited to him, the greater the fear in which he would be held.

Thus it was that it finally became impossible to get any one to accept the position of sheriff of Lincoln county, for it was only a question of time when he would run across the youthful demon.

The Kid knew that he had terrorized the country. He knew that the instant he let down his guard he would be killed. His safety lay in continuing.

The Turn of the Tide.

Then, one day, even those hard characters who professed to be his friends were amazed by the report that for some trivial incident he had killed a member of his own band. The outlaws were now as anxious to end his career as were the law-abiding people of the village. His friends commenced to murmur. The Kid was now reported in a dozen places at the same time, and these stories he turned to his advantage by appearing at irregular, though frequent, intervals in widely separated cow camps for more than a hundred and fifty miles north and south of the Pecos river.

Pat Garrett, a lanky Alabaman, who had helped organize the Texas Rangers and had assisted in driving the bad men out of Texas to the first water west of the Staked Plains, was invited by the cattlemen to locate in New Mexico. They wanted him to restore order. The only way that could be done was either to arrest or to kill the Kid.

Garrett's record in Texas as a man-hunter and bad man tamer was known all over the southwest. In addition to being quick with a gun, he was absolutely without fear.

He was elected without opposition and took hold with an iron hand. He was an organizer, and men flocked to his standard. They felt, instinctively, that at last a man had arrived who could cope with the situation.

The Capture of the Kid.

In November, 1880, Garrett came upon the Kid suddenly and captured him, with several others, after killing one man.

Word had reached Garrett that the Kid and his gang of three were located in an old house a short distance from Sumner.

"We had better make plans to get him," said one of the deputies.

"The plan is to get there before he gets away. I'll tell you what to do on the way."

The way led down a sage-covered "draw," with several bends made by sand dunes around which the road curved for a distance of about five miles. Before he reached the last bend he pulled up his horse, and waiting for his deputies to come up to him, and then, in the even voice for which he was noted, said:

"I am going to ride ahead. All attention will be centered on me. That will give you a chance to surround the house. I am going to take my time and walk my horse. They may get me, but if they do I want you to make certain that you get him."

The deputies withdrew to right and left, advancing under cover of the sand hills in an ever-widening circle until they had surrounded the house. Then Garrett rode forward. From his position he could see his deputies, who had dismounted, advancing cautiously through the sage-brush. He permitted his horse to walk slowly, as though utterly unconscious of the presence of the gang. At the door he called loudly.

Some one appeared at the window and, firing a shot at the sheriff, dodged back. It was done in an instant, but in that fraction of a second the man who had fired dropped dead in his tracks! Garrett had dismounted, and with his deputies poured a fusillade of bullets through the sides of the thinly boarded shack. A white handkerchief at the window indicated the surrender of Billy the Kid and his gang.

"You Give Me a 'Six-Gun,' Pat!"

When Garrett reached the railroad with his prisoner he was menaced by a crowd that sought to lynch the Kid.

"It looks as though they are going to get me, Pat," the Kid remarked.

It was an ugly crowd, bent on dealing to the boy the fate he was certain to meet sooner or later.

"Not if I can help it, Billy. You are under my care, and I intend to protect you."

"You give me a 'six-gun,' Pat, and stand aside a few moments, and I will clean out the whole crowd. You'll see them stampede the minute you give me a gun."

"You could help—if you played square."

"I'd have to, old man. I'm in the tightest place I ever was in my life. They'll 'get' us both, if you try it alone. They may get me, anyway. But you are up against it, if you try to defend me along."

"I'll trust you once, Billy; but understand, no foolishness. I'll 'drop' you if you try it."

The crowd grew more menacing. The demand for the life of the Kid became more insistent.

"Listen!" shouted the tall sheriff during a slight lull. "The man is my prisoner. You told me to arrest him. I have. He must have a fair trial. I know he is guilty. But it is for a jury to pronounce him so. You can not take him while I have a breath of life left, or while Billy the Kid has, either!"

Saying which he passed a revolver to the boy who had struck terror into the Pecos Valley,

"You must get two of us now."

Back to back the sheriff of Lincoln county and the most noted murderer in the southwest stood.

"Now, Billy," cautioned Garret, "don't shoot unless I tell you to. Remember that without me your life is not worth two bits today."

It was impossible to tell what was working in the mind concealed behind the childish face of the Kid. It was equally as impossible to read the thoughts of the determined sheriff who waited with apparent unconcern. The crowd knew and feared the Kid. With only Garrett to fight, the members might have risked it. With a revolver in the Kid's hand, they hesitated.

Garrett was quick to see the advantage he had gained.

"Now you will all move quietly away," he announced decisively.

Sullenly the crowd obeyed.

Held at bay, Garrett placed the Kid aboard the train which arrived a few moments later.

The Keeper and the "Makings."

The Kid was tried in another county. He had no friends and no defense. There were plenty of witnesses against him now that he was a prisoner. He was defended by an attorney who made a brave fight. But he was sentenced to be hanged at Lincoln in July, 1881. He was brought back and confined in a jail built after the manner of Mexican houses, of adobe brick, with thick walls around a court or patio.

The day before he was to be hanged, half a dozen horses stood in the street, lines thrown over their heads—all that is necessary to make a cow pony remain in one place.

The Kid called from the gallery to the warden: "Hi, there, Bell! I'm going to swing tomorrow. Give me the 'makings,' will you?"

"Seguro, Miguel," shouted the warden, laughing. (Translated into English, the answer meant "Sure, Mike.")

The Kid stepped to the stairs. His hands were manacled in such manner that he had little use of them. The warden reached in his vest pocket for the cigarette paper, which he placed in his left hand, and with his right felt in his hip pocket for a sack of tobacco.

Like a flash the Kid raised his manacled hands and struck Bell square in the temple. The warden staggered. As he did so the Kid jerked Bell's revolver from its holster, and dealt the jailer a blow on the head that crushed his skull.

"Unfasten the jewelry, and we'll both get away!"

He shouted these words to another prisoner standing inside a cell. The Kid had been allowed the freedom of the galleries. He passed the keys taken from the prostrate warden to the man in the cell, who unlocked his handcuffs. Then, leveling the warden's revolver at the prisoner, he hissed:

"Give me back the keys!"

It was the work of but a moment to reach the barred gate that led into the street where the horses stood. A glance, and he took it all in. From where he stood he could see the form of the warden. Leveling his revolver, he fired a shot that ended his life, and then shot the man who blocked the door.

Once outside, he started a fusillade of bullets up and down the street to keep everybody in the houses. In another instant he was on the best horse and had stampeded the others so that pursuit would be delayed. In a few moments he was out of sight.

Garrett was about twenty miles away at the time after some rustlers. Word was sent to him and he returned post haste, heard the story from excited lips, and stopped only long enough to saddle a fresh horse. Accompanied by a few friends he took the Kid's trail.

At the end of forty-eight hours of flight, when tired out, Billy the Kid stopped at the house of a man named Maxwell, near Sumner. Retiring, he figured, doubtless, that Garrett would have to pause for rest also.

It was early the second morning, probably about 3 a. m., when the silent sheriff saw in front of him the cabin in which the Kid slept. He and his men dismounted and approached the house. Garrett reached the porch with his deputies and quietly stepped into Maxwell's room.

There are several accounts of what took place. One is to the effect that Garrett left his deputies stationed outside beyond the house. He was whispring to Maxwell, when the Kid, who was a light sleeper, awoke, and tiptoeing across the porch, entered, revolver in hand, and asked:

"Who was that who just came? Where is he?"

From his position Garrett could see him distinctly, and had the Kid been looking, he might have distinguished the form of the sheriff, standing by the bedside of Maxwell. The Kid had his revolver in hand, prepared to use it. Garrett knew that, and fired the single shot that killed the Kid.

INVESTIGATION OF INFLUENCE OF TYPE AND AGE UPON UTILIZATION OF FEEDS

Results Given of Experiment Conducted by Officials of the United States Agricultural Department on Two Steer Calves, One a Pure-Bred and the Other a Scrub.

(By R. G. WEATHERSTONE.)

It is a fact of common knowledge that marked differences exist between individual animals as regards the returns which they yield for the feed consumed. A current statement is that a good feeder has a greater digestive power than a poor one, or that the power of assimilation of the one animal is superior to that of the other and it has been assumed that the advantage of the better type of animal lay in its ability to produce more flesh or fat from a unit of feed than should the poorer one.

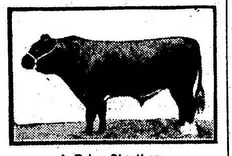
It has also been commonly taught, and seems to be generally accepted, by the animal husbandmen as an established fact, that the young growing animals not only make actually larger gains than the more mature ones, but likewise more economical gains.

The influence of type and age upon the utilization of feed by cattle has, therefore, been investigated by officials of the department of agriculture, with the following result:

Two steer calves were selected as the subjects of this investigation, one a pure-bred typical beef animal of one of the well-known beef brands, the other a "scrub" of mixed breeding. Exhaustive feeding trials were carried out with these animals, including twenty-four experiments with the respiration calorimeter.

Finally the steers were subjected to a slaughter test, whereby the quality of the meat and relative size of the various cuts were accurately determined. The work is therefore important alike to the practical feeder and the agricultural scientist.

The feeding stuffs used were of the same kind for both the animals in all the periods, and the different grains used were mixed throughout in the same proportion for each steer. At intervals during the time the digestibility of the total ration and the nitrogen balance were determined for each animal.



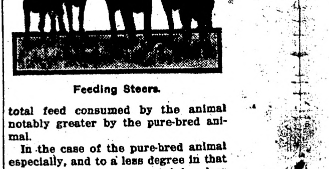
A Prize Shorthorn.

During each of the three winters covered by the investigation, four experiments were made on each animal by means of the respiration calorimeter in order to determine the percentage of availability of the energy of the feed consumed.

During the first winter—that of 1908-9—the feeding stuffs used differed from those employed during the ordinary feeding. In the succeeding two winters the grain feeds used were the same, only the amount differing.

While the results fail to show any material difference between the physiological processes of food utilization in the two animals, they do show clearly an economic superiority of the pure-bred over the scrub steer, due first to his relatively smaller maintenance requirement, and, second, to his ability to consume a larger surplus of feed above the requirement.

Both of the facts tend to make the actual production of human food in the form of meat and fat per unit of total feed consumed by the animal notably greater by the pure-bred animal.



Feeding Steers.

In the case of the pure-bred animal especially, and to a less degree in that of the scrub, rations containing less available energy and notably less digestible protein than the amounts called for by the current feeding standards for growing cattle, produced entirely satisfactory gains in live weight.

A distinct influence of age upon the maintenance requirement was observed between the ages of fourteen and thirty-nine months, the requirements decreasing relatively as the animals matured. The gain in weight of the scrub, as compared with that by the pure-bred steer consisted more largely of protein with its accompanying water and to a smaller extent of fat, and therefore, represented a materially smaller storage of feed energy. This was also indicated by the results of the butchering test. When the animals were killed the scrub was rated as "common," and the pure-bred was graded as "prime." The total dressed weight and the weight of the several wholesale cuts show the considerably higher percentage of dressed weight in the case of the pure-bred, which is characteristic of the beef animal.

Likewise the predominance of the loin cuts over the less valuable cuts of the fore-quarter in the beef animal as compared with the scrub, and the marketable meat of the retail cuts show that the proportion of more valuable cuts was notably greater in the pure-bred.

PREPARING BED FOR ASPARAGUS

Best Time for Setting Plants Out Is in Early Spring, About End of April.

A good asparagus bed is expected to last twenty years. The soil should, therefore, be prepared in a most thorough manner.

A warm, sandy soil is best, but it will do well in any good garden soil that is free from stones. A soil that has been heavily manured a few previous seasons is preferable to manuring heavily at the time of setting out the roots, but at no period should asparagus be allowed to suffer from lack of manuring, as first-class shoots can only be grown in very rich soil.

For the home garden the plants may be set out in rows about thirty inches apart, having the plants about eighteen inches apart.

The best time for setting out asparagus, is early in the spring, usually about the end of April. Where the rows are to be make furrows one foot wide and eight inches deep. In these furrows set the plants in a natural position with the roots spread well apart and about twelve to eighteen inches apart. Be careful to cover the crown of the plants not more than two inches in the start, as the shoots from newly set plants are not strong enough to force through a deep mass of earth. The furrow may be gradually filled as the shoots advance in growth.

The object of setting the crowns so far below the surface is to protect them from injury when cutting the shoots for use, as they are usually cut about two inches below the surface.

Although growers differ in their opinions on what the age of plants for setting should be, one-year-old plants seem to give the best satisfaction.

Watering Milk.

In many parts of Europe the watering of milk is impossible because the cows or goats are driven through the streets to the door of the customer and milked in his presence. The milkman has different measures, ranging in size from an eighth of a pint to a quart, and one can buy one cent's worth of milk if desired.

BREEDING EWES DURING WINTER

Overcrowding Is Direct Cause of Many Losses—Outdoor Exercise Needed.

Weak, emaciated ewes cannot bring vigorous, well-developed lambs in the spring. It is imperative to have the ewe flock in good condition during the winter, so that they may bring good, robust lambs and supply them with plenty of nourishment.

Overcrowding the ewe flock during winter is direct cause of many losses. It not only causes ewes to become sluggish and dull, but frequently it raises the temperature of the barn and causes the ewes to perspire, and when they are turned out in the yards they develop colds with the result of catarrh.

If possible they should be kept in flocks of twenty to forty ewes. In this way there will be less danger of crowding, and they will exercise freely. Breeding ewes should have exercise, and every day when the weather is fine they should be allowed to roam over the yards and pastures. Out of door exercise and plenty of pasture will insusre a crop of thrifty and well-developed lambs next spring.

Dairymen's Associations.

Dairymen's associations can do much through its membership to stimulate better methods on dairy farms, and if the factory men would stand shoulder to shoulder and refuse to take milk that was unclean, or that had to be cooked before it could be used for food, dairymen would realize the usefulness of following such methods as some of them are following today, and in a few years dirty milk would be a thing of the past, and every dairyman would be a better dairyman than he is now, because the better dairyman a man is the greater would be his income be.

Use of Lime.

The old proverb in agriculture was that lime makes the father rich, but the sons poor. That might be paraphrased to say the lack of lime makes the father poor and his sons poorer. The intelligent use of lime does not make anyone poor; it is the abuse of lime that might make the sons poor.

The ENCHANTED HAT

By HAROLD MacGRATH

Author of "The Man on the Box," "The Goose Girl," Etc.

(Copyright, by the Bobbs-Merrill Company)

IT was half-after six when I entered Martin's from the Broadway side. I chose a table by the north wall and sat down on the cushioned seat. I ordered dinner, and the ample proportions of it completely hookwinked the waiter as to the condition of my cardiac affliction; being, as I was, desperately and hopelessly and miserably in love. Old owls say that a man can not eat when he is in love. He can if he is mad at the way the object of his affections has treated him; and I was mad. To be sure, I can not recall what my order was, but the amount of the waiter's check is still vivid to my recollection.

I glanced about. At my left sat a young man about my own age. He was also in evening dress. At my right a benevolent old gentleman, whose eye-glasses balanced neatly upon the end of his nose, was deeply interested in the Law Journal and a pint of mineral water. A little beyond my table was an exiled Frenchman, and the irritating odor of absinthe drifted at times across my nostrils.

With my coffee I ordered a glass of Dantzic, and watched the flakes of beaten gold waver and settle; and presently I devoted myself entirely to my own particularly miserable thoughts. . . To be in love and in debt! To be with the gods one moment and hunted by a bill-collector the next!

Suppose, besides, that you possessed a rich uncle who said that on the day of your wedding he would make over to you fifty thousand in government three per cents. Hard, wasn't it? And suppose the girl was independently rich. Heigh-ho!

I find that a man needs more money in love than he does in debt. This is not to say that I was ever very hard pressed; but I hated to pay ten dollars "on account" when the total was only twenty.

And now it was all over!

I did not care so much about my uncle's gold-bonds, but I did think a powerful lot of the girl. Why, when I recall the annoyances I've put up with from that kid brother of hers! . . . Pshaw, what's the use?

His mother called him "Toddy-One-Boy," in memory of a book she had read long years ago. He was six years old, and I never think of him without that jingle coming to mind:

"Little Willie choked his sister.
She was dead before they missed her.
Willie's always up to tricks.
Ain't he cute, he's only six!"

All these things I thought over as I sat at my table. Well, I would go up to the club, and if I didn't get home till mor-r-ning, who was there to care?

The Frenchman had gone, and the benevolent old gentleman. The crowd was thinning out. The young man at my left rose and I rose also. We both stared thoughtfully at the hat-rack. There hung two hats; an opera hat and a dilapidated old stovepipe. The young fellow reached up and, quite naturally, selected the opera hat. He glanced into it, and immediately a wrinkle of annoyance darkened his brow. He held the hat toward me.

"Is this yours?" he asked.

I looked at the label.

"No." The wrinkle of annoyance sprang from his brow to mine. My opera hat had cost me eight dollars.

The young fellow laughed rather lamely. "Do you live in New York?" he asked.

I nodded.

"So do I," he continued, "and yet it is evident that both of us have been neatly caught." He thought for a moment, then brightened. "I'll tell you what; let's match for the good one."

I gazed indignantly at the rusty stovepipe. "Done!" said I.

I lost; I knew that I should; and the young fellow walked off with the good hat.

Angrily, I strode up to the cashier's desk and explained the situation, leaving my address and the number of my apartment; my name wasn't necessary.

I soon arrived at my apartments, and got into a smoking-jacket. I picked up Blackstone and turned to his "promissory notes." I had two or three out myself. It was nine o'clock when the hall-boy's bell rang, and I placed my ear to the tube. A gentleman wished to see me in regard to a lost hat.

"Send him up, James; send him up!" I bawled down the tube. Visions of the club returned, and I tossed Blackstone into a corner.

Presently there came a tap on the door, and I flung it wide. But my visitor was not the benevolent old gentleman. He was the Frenchman whose absinthe had offended me. He glanced at the slip of paper in his hand.

"I have zee honaire to address zee —ah—gentleman in numbaire six?"

"I live here."

"Delight'! We have meexed zee hats, I have zee r-r-regret. Ees thees your hat?" He held out, for my inspection, an opera hat. "I am so absent-mind'—what you call deestrait?" —affably.

I took the hat, which at first glance I thought to be mine, and went over to the rack, taking down the old stovepipe.

"This is yours, then?" I said, smiling.

"Thousand thanks, m'sieu! Eet ees certain mine. I have zee honaire to beg pardon for zee confusion. My compliments! Good night!"

Without giving the hat a single glance, he clapped it on his head, bowed and disappeared, leaving me his card. He hadn't been gone two minutes when I discovered that the hat he had exchanged for the stovepipe was not mine.

Ting-a-ling! It was the boy's bell again.

"Well?"

"Another man after a hat. What's goin' on?"

"Send him up!" I yelled. It came over me that the Frenchman had made a second mistake.

I was not disappointed this time in my visitor. It was the benevolent old gentleman. Evidently he had not located his hat either, and might not for some time to come. I began to believe that I had carelessly given it to the Frenchman. He seemed to be terribly excited.

"You are the gentleman who occupies number six?"

"Yes, sir. This is my apartment. You have come in regard to a hat?"

"Yes, sir. My name is Chittenden. Our hats got mixed up at Martin's this evening; my fault, as usual. I am always doing something absurd, my memory is so bad. When I discovered my mistake I was calling on the family of a client with whom I had spent most of the afternoon. I missed some valuable papers, legal documents. I believed as usual that I had forgotten to take them with me. They were nowhere to be found at the house. My client has a very mischievous son, and it seems that he stuffed the papers behind the inside band of my hat. With them there was a letter. I have had two very great scares. A great deal of trouble would ensue if the papers were lost. I just telephoned that I had located the hat." He laughed pleasantly.

Good heavens! here was a howdy-do.

"My dear Mr. Chittenden, there has been a great confusion," I faltered. "I had your hat, but—but you have come too late."

"Too late?" he roared, or I should say, to be exact, shouted.

"Yes, sir."

"What have you done with it?"

"Not five minutes ago I gave it to a Frenchman who seemed to recognize it as his. It was the Frenchman, if you will remember, who sat near your table in the cafe."

"And this hat isn't yours, then?"—helplessly.

"This" was a flat-brimmed hat of the Paris boulevards, the father of all stovepipe hats, dear to the Frenchman's heart.

"Candidly, now," said I with a bit of excusable impatience, "do I look like a man who would wear a hat like that?"

He surveyed me miserably through his eye-glasses.

"No, I can't say that you do. But what in the world am I to do?" He mopped his brow in the ecstasy of anguish. "The hat must be found. The legal papers could be replaced, but . . . You see, sir, that boy put a private letter of his sister's in the band of that hat, and it must be recovered at all hazards."

"I am very sorry, sir."

"But what shall I do?"

"I do not see what can be done save for you to leave word at the cafe. The Frenchman is doubtless a frequenter, and may easily be found. If you had come a few moments sooner. . . ."

With a gurgle of dismay he fled, leaving me with a half-finished sentence hanging on my lips and the Frenchman's chapeau hanging on my fingers. And my hat; where was my hat?

So the boy had put a letter of his sister's in the band of the hat, I mused. How like her kid brother! It seemed that more or less families had Toddy-One-Boys to look after. Pshaw! what a muddle because a man couldn't keep his thoughts from wool-gathering!

Fool that I was! I rushed over to the table. The Frenchman had left his card, and I had forgotten all about it. And I hadn't asked the benevolent old gentleman where he lived. The Frenchman's card read: "M. de Beausire, No. —— Washington Place." I decided to go myself to the address, state the matter to Monsieur de Beausire, and rescue the letter. I knew all about these Toddy-One-Boys, and I might be doing some girl a signal service.

So I reluctantly got into my coat again, drew on a top-coat, and put on the hat that fitted me. I had scarcely drawn my stick from the umbrella-jar when the bell rang once again.

"Hello!" I called down the tube. Why couldn't they let me be?

"Lady wants to see you, sir."

"A lady!"

"Yes, sir. A real lady; l-a-d-y. She says she's come to see the gentleman in number six about a plug hat. What's the graft, anyway?"

"A plug hat!"

"Yes, sir; a plug hat. She seems a bit anxious. Shall I send her up? She's a peach."

"Yes, send her up." I answered feebly enough.

And now there was a woman in the case! I wiped the perspiration from my brow and wondered what I should say to her. A woman. . . . By Jove! the sister of the mischievous boy! Old Chittenden must have told her where he had gone, and as he hasn't shown up, she's worried. It must be a tremendously important letter to cause all this hubbub. So I laid aside my hat and waited.

Soon there came a gentle tapping. Certainly the young woman had abundant pluck. I approached the door quickly, and flung it open.

The Girl herself stood on the threshold, and we stared at each other with bewildered eyes!

CHAPTER II.

She was the most exquisite creature in all the wide world; and here she was, within reach of my hungry arms!

"You?" she cried, stepping back, one hand at her throat and the other against the jamb of the door.

Dumb as ever was Lot's wife (after the turning-point in her career), I stood and stared and admired.

"I did not expect . . . that is, only the number of the apartment was given," she stammered. "I . . ." Then her slender figure straightened, and with an effort she subdued the fright and dismay which had evidently seized her. "Have you Mr. Chittenden's hat?"

"Mr. Chittenden's hat?" I repeated, with a tingling in my throat similar to that when you hit your elbow smartly on a sharp corner. "Mr. Chittenden's hat?"

"Can't you say anything more than that?"—impatiently.

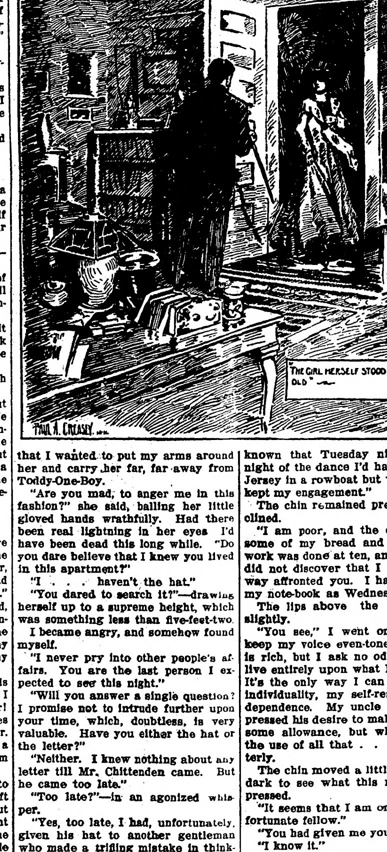
"Was it your letter he was seeking?" I cried, all eagerness and excitement as this one sane thought entered my head.

"Did he tell you that there was a letter in it?"—scornfully.

"Yes," guiltily. Heaven only knows why I should have had any sense of guilt.

"Give it to me at once"—imperatively.

"The hat or the letter?" Truly, I did not know what I was about. Only one thing was plain to my confused mind, and that was the knowledge that I wanted to put my arms around her and carry her far, far away from Toddy-One-Boy.



THE GIRL HERSELF STOOD ON THE THRESHOLD"
PAUL A. CREASEY

"Are you mad, to anger me in this fashion?" she said, balling her little gloved hands wrathfully. Had there been real lightning in her eyes I'd have been dead this long while. "Do you dare believe that I knew you lived in this apartment?"

"I . . . haven't the hat."

"You dared to search it?"—drawing herself up to a supreme height, which was something less than five-feet-two.

I became angry, and somehow found myself.

"I never pry into other people's affairs. You are the last person I expected to see this night."

"Will you answer a single question? I promise not to intrude further upon your time, which, doubtless, is very valuable. Have you either the hat or the letter?"

"Neither. I knew nothing about any letter till Mr. Chittenden came. But he came too late."

"Too late?"—in an agonized whisper.

"Yes, too late, I had, unfortunately, given his hat to another gentleman who made a trifling mistake in thinking it to be his own." Suddenly my manners returned to me. "Will you come in?"

"Come in? No! You have given the hat to another man? A trifling mistake! He calls it a trifling mistake!"—addressing the heavens, obscured though they were by the thickness of several ceilings. "Oh, what shall I do?" She began to wring her hands, and when a woman does that what earthly hope is there for the man who looks on?

"Don't do that!" I implored. "I'll find the hat. The gentleman left me his card. With your permission I will go at once in search of him."

"I have a cab outside. Give me the address."

"I refuse to permit you to go alone."

"You have absolutely nothing to say in regard to where I shall or shall not go."

"In this one instance. I shall withhold the address."

How her eyes blazed!

"Oh, it is easily to be seen that you do not trust me." I was utterly discouraged.

"I did not imply that," with the least bit of softening. "Certainly I would trust you. But——"

"Well?"—as laughingly as I could.

"I must be the one to take out that letter,"—decidedly.

"I offer to bring you the hat untouched," I replied.

"I insist on going."

"Very well; we shall go together; under no other circumstances. This is a common courtesy that I would show to a perfect stranger."

I put on my derby, took up the Frenchman's card and tile, and bowed her gravely into the main hallway. We did not speak on the way down to the street. We entered the cab in silence, and went rumbling off southwest. When the monotony became positively unbearable I spoke.

"I regret to force myself upon you."

No reply.

"It must be a very important letter."

"To no one but myself,"—with extreme frigidity.

"His father ought to wring his neck,"—thinking of Toddy-One-Boy.

"Sir, he is my brother!"

"I beg your pardon." It seemed that I wasn't getting on very well.

We bumped across the Broadway tracks. Once or twice our shoulders touched, and the thrill I experienced was as painful as it was rapturous. What was in a letter that she should go to this extreme to recall it? A heat-flash of jealousy went over me. She had written to some other fellow; for there always is some other fellow, hang him! . . . And then a grand idea came into my erstwhile stupid head. Here she was, alone with me in a cab. It was the opportunity of a lifetime. I could force her to listen to my explanation.

"I received your note," I began. "It was cruel and without justice."

Her chin went up a degree.

"The worst criminal is not condemned without a hearing, and I have had none."

No perceptible movement.

"We are none of us infallible in keeping appointments. We are liable to make mistakes occasionally. Had I known that Tuesday night was the night of the dance I'd have crossed to Jersey in a rowboat but what I'd have kept my engagement."

The chin remained precipitously inclined.

"I am poor, and the case involved some of my bread and butter. The work was done at ten, and even then I did not discover that I had in any way affronted you. I had it down in my note-book as Wednesday night."

The lips above the chin curled slightly.

"You see," I went on, striving to keep my voice even-toned, "my uncle is rich, but I ask no odds of him. I live entirely upon what I earn at law. It's the only way I can maintain my individuality, my self-respect and independence. My uncle has often expressed his desire to make me a handsome allowance, but what would be the use of all that . . . now?"—bitterly.

The chin moved a little. It was too dark to see what this movement expressed.

"It seems that I am only a very unfortunate fellow."

"You had given me your promise."

"I know it."

"Not that I cared,"—with cat-like cruelty; "but I lost the last train out while waiting for you. Not even a note to warn me! Not the slightest chance to find an escort! When a man gives his promise to a lady it does not seem possible that he could forget it . . . if he cared to keep it."

"I tell you honestly that I mixed the dates." How weak my excuses seemed, now that they had passed my lips!

"You are sure that you mixed nothing else?"—ironically. (She afterward apologized for this.) "It appears that it would have been better to come alone."

"I regret that I did not give you the address."

"It is not too late."

"I never retreat from any position I have taken."

"Indeed?"

Then both our chins assumed an acute angle and remained thus. When a woman is angry she is about as reasonable as a frightened horse; when a man is angry he longs to hit something or smoke a cigar. Imagine my predicament!

When the cab reached Washington Place and came to a stand I spoke again.

"Shall I take the hat in, or will you?" I asked.

"We shall go together."

Ah, if only I had had the courage to say: "I would it were for ever!" But I feared that it wouldn't take.

I rang the bell, and presently a maid opened the door.

"Is Monsieur de Beausire in?" I asked.

"No, sir, he is not," the maid answered civilly.

"Do you know where he may be found?"

"If you have a bill you may leave it,"—frostily and with sudden suspicion.

There was a smothered sound from behind me, and I flushed angrily.

"I am not a bill-collector."

"Oh; it's the second day of the month, you know. I thought perhaps you were."

"He has in his possession a hat which does not belong to him."

"Good gracious, he hasn't been stealing? I don't believe"—making as though to shut the door.

This was too much, and I laughed. "No, my girl; he hasn't been stealing. But, being absent-minded, he has taken another man's hat, and I am bringing his home in hopes of getting the one he took by mistake."

"Oh!" And the maid laughed shrilly.

I held out the hat.

"My land! that's his hat, sure enough. I was wondering what made him look so funny when he went out."

"Where has he gone?" came sharply over my shoulder.

"If you will wait," said the maid good-naturedly, "I will inquire."

We waited. So far as I was concerned, I hoped he was miles away, and that we might go on riding for hours and hours. The maid returned soon.

"He has gone to meet the French consul at Mouquin's."

"Which one?" I asked. "There are two, one down and one up-town."

"I'm sure I don't know. You can leave the hat and your card."

"Thank you; we shall retain the hat. If we find monsieur he will need it." And the only girl in the world and myself re-entered the cab.

"This is terrible!" she murmured as we drove off.

"It might be worse," I replied, thinking of the probable long ride with her: perhaps the last I should ever take!

"How could it be!"

I had nothing to offer, and subsided for a space.

"If we should not find him!"

"I'll sit on his front steps all night . . . Forgive me if I sound flippant; but I mean it."

"We shall continue the search together,"—wearily.

It was not far up-town to the restaurant, and we made good time.

"Would you know him if you saw him?" she asked as we left the cab.

"Not the least doubt of it,"—confidently.

She sighed, and together we entered the restaurant. It was full of theater-going people, music and the hum of voices. We must have created a small sensation, wandering from table to table, from room to room, the girl with a look of dread and weariness on her face, and I with the Frenchman's hat grasped firmly in my hand and my brows scowling. If I hadn't been in love it would have been a fine comedy. Once I surprised her looking toward the corner table near the orchestra. How many joyous Sunday dinners we had had there! Heigh-ho!

"It that he?" she whispered, clutching my arm of a sudden, her gaze directed to a near-by table.

I looked and shook my head.

"We may have to go down-town. . . . No! as I live, there he is now!" —joyfully.

"Where?" There was half a sob in her throat.

"The table by the short flight of stairs . . the man just lighting the cigarette. I'll go alone."

"But I can not stand here alone in the middle of the floor . . ."

I called a waiter. "Give this lady a chair for a moment;" and I dropped a coin in his palm. He bowed, and beckoned for her to follow. . . . Women are always writing fool things, and then moving Heaven and earth to recall them.

"Monsieur de Beausire?" I said inquiringly.

Beausire glanced up.

"Oh, eet ees . . . I forget zee name?"

I told him.

"I am delight'!" he cried joyfully, as if he had known me all my life. "Zee chair; be seat' . . ."

"Thank you, but it's about the hats."

"Hats?"

"Yes. It seems that the hat I gave you belongs to another man. In your haste you did not notice the mistake. This is your hat,"—producing the shining tile.

"Mon Dieu!" he gasped, seizing the hat; "eet ees mine! See! I bring heem from France; zee nom ees mine. V'la! And I nevaire look in zee uzzer hat! I am pair-fickly dumfound'!" And his astonishment was genuine.

"Where is the other hat, the one I gave you?" I was in a great hurry.

"I have heem here," reaching to the vacant chair at his side, while the French consul eyed us both with some suspicion. We might be lunatics. Beausire handed me th benevolent old gentleman's hat, and the burden dropped from my shoulders. "Eet ees such a meestake! I laugh; eh?" He shook with merriment. "I wear two hats and not know see meestake!"

I thanked him and made off as gracefully as I could. The girl rose as she saw me returning. When I reached her side she was standing with her slender body inclined toward me. She stretched forth a hand and solemnly I gave her Mr. Chittenden's hat. I wondered vaguely if any-one was looking at us, and, if so, what he thought of us.

The girl pulled the hat literally inside out in her eagerness; but her gloved fingers trembled so that the precious letter fluttered to the floor. We both stooped, but I was quicker. It was no attempt on my part to see the address; my act was one of common politeness. But I could not help seeing the name. It was my own!

"Give it to me!" she cried breathlessly.

I did so. I was not, at that particular moment, capable of doing anything else. I was too bewildered. My own name! She turned, hugging the hat, the legal documents and the letter, and hurried down the main stairs, I at her heels.

"Tell the driver my address; I can return alone."

"I can not permit that," I objected decidedly. "The driver is a stranger to us both. I insist on seeing you to the door; after that you may rest assured that I shall no longer inflict upon you my presence, odious as it doubtless is to you."

As she was already in the cab and could not get out without aid, I climbed in beside her and called the street and number to the driver.

"Legally the letter is mine; it is addressed to me, and has passed out of your keeping."

"You shall never, never have it!"—vehemently.

"It is not necessary that I should," I replied, "for I vaguely understand."

I saw that it was all over. There was now no reason why I should not speak my mind fully.

"I can understand without reading. You realized that your note was cruel and unlike anything you had done, and your good heart compelled you to write an apology; but your pride got the better of you, and upon second thought you concluded to let the unmerited hurt go on."

"Will you kindly stop the driver, or shall I?"

"Does truth annoy you?"

"I decline to discuss truth with you. Will you stop the driver?"

"Not until we reach Seventy-first street west."

"By what right—"

"The right of a man who loves you. There, it is out, and my pride has gone down the wind. After tonight I shall trouble you no further. But every man has the right to tell one woman that he loves her and I love you. I loved you the moment I first laid eyes on you. I couldn't help it. I say this to you now because I perceive how futile it is. What dreams I have conjured up about you! Poor fool! When I was at work your face was always crossing the page or peering up from the margins. I never saw a fine painting that I did not think of you, or heard a fine piece of music that I did not think of your voice."

There was a long interval of silence; block after block went by. I never once looked at her.

"If I had been rich I should have put it to the touch some time ago; but my poverty seems to have been fortunate; it has saved me a refusal. In some way I have mortally offended you; how, I can not imagine. It can not be simply because I innocently broke an engagement."

Then she spoke.

"You dined after the theater that night with a comic-opera singer. You were quite at liberty to do so, only you might have done me the honor to notify me that you had made your choice of entertainment."

So it was out! Decidedly it was all over now. I never could explain away the mistake.

"I have already explained to you my unfortunate mistake. There was and is no harm that I can see in dining with a woman of her attainments. But I shall put up no defense. You have convicted me. I retract nothing I have said. I do love you."

I was very sorry for myself.

Cabby drew up. I alighted, and she silently permitted me to assist her down. I expected her immediately to mount the steps. Instead, she hesitated, the knuckle of a forefinger against her lips, and assumed the thoughtful pose of one who contemplates two courses.

"Have you a stamp?" she asked finally.

"A stamp?"—blankly.

"Yes; a postage-stamp."

I fumbled in my pocket and found, luckily, a single pink square, which I gave to her. She moistened it with the tip of her tongue and . . . stuck it on the letter!

"Now, please, drop this in the corner box for me, and take this hat over to Mr. Chittenden's—Sixty-ninth."

"What—"

"Do as I say, or I shall ask you to return the letter to me."

I rushed off toward the letter-box, drew down the lid, and deposited the letter—my letter. When I returned she was running up the steps, and a second later she had disappeared.

I hadn't been so happy in all my life!

Cabby waited at the curb.

Suddenly I became conscious that I was holding something in my hand. It was the benevolent old gentleman's stovepipe hat!

I pushed the button, pushed it good and hard. Presently I heard a window open cautiously.

"What is it?" asked a querulous voice.

"Mr. Chittenden?"

"Yes."

"Well, here's your hat!" I cried.

This has been well known to the best doctors for years as the quickest and most reliable cure obtainable for rheumatism and backache. It has been published here for several winters and hundreds of the worst cases cured by it in a short time. "From your druggist get one ounce of Toris compound (in original sealed package) and one ounce of syrup of Sarsaparilla compound. Take these two ingredients home and put them into a half pint of good whiskey. Shake the bottle and take a tablespoonful before each meal and at bedtime." Results come the first day. If your druggist does not have Toris Compound in stock he will get it in a few hours from his wholesale house. Don't be influenced to take some patent medicine instead of this. Insist on having the genuine Toris compound in the original, one-ounce, sealed, yellow package. Published by the Globe Pharmaceutical laboratories of Chicago.

Literary Betrothal.

Inscriptions in complimentary copies of learned works do not always serve the graceful purpose to which one was dedicated by the celebrated Professor Wilson of Edinburgh.

When the suitor for the hand of Professor Wilson's daughter had gained the young woman's approbation, she of course referred him to her father. Having stated his case, the young gentleman was asked to bid the young lady to come to her father. Her obedience was prompt.

Professor Wilson had before him for review a ponderous volume, on the fly-leaf of which was duly inscribed, "With the author's compliments."

He tore this fly-leaf out, pinned it to his daughter's dress, solemnly led her to the anxious lover—and went back to his work.—Youth's Companion.

At the Studio.

A motor stopped in front of the photographer's, and a woman lacking none of the artificial accessories deemed necessary to "looks," entered the studio.

A couple of days later the photographer submitted proofs for her approval.

"Not one of those pictures looks anything like me," the woman insisted.

The photographer tried in every way to pacify her, but finding this an impossibility, lost control of his temper:

"Madam!" he exclaimed, "did you read my sign?"

"Yes."

"Well! It does not say 'cleaning, dyeing and remodeling.' It says 'portraits.'"

Incompetent Georgie.

Little George was six years old and the family was much interested in having him start to school, but he insisted that he was not going.

One day his grandmother said to him: "Georgie, you are going to school with sister this winter, aren't you?"

"No, grandma, I'm not going to school at all. I can't read, nor I can't write, nor I can't sing, and I'd like to know what good I'd be at school."

A DIFFERENCE.

It Paid This Man to Change Food.

"What is called 'good living' eventually brought me to a condition quite the reverse of good health,' writes a N. Y. merchant.

"Improper eating told on me till my stomach became so weak that food nauseated me, even the lightest and simplest lunch, and I was much depressed after a night of uneasy slumber, unfitting me for business.

"This condition was discouraging, as I could find no way to improve it. Then I saw the advertisement of Grape-Nuts food, and decided to try it, and became delighted with the result.

"For the past three years I have used Grape-Nuts and nothing else for my breakfast and for lunch before retiring. It speedily set my stomach right and I congratulate myself that I have regained my health. There is no greater comfort for a tired man than a lunch of Grape-Nuts. It insures restful sleep, and an awakening in the morning with a feeling of buoyant courage and hopefulness.

"Grape-Nuts has been a boon to my whole family. It has made of our 2-year-old boy, who used to be unable to digest much of anything, a robust, healthy, little rascal weighing 32 pounds. Mankind certainly owes a debt of gratitude to the expert who invented this perfect food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

LOVER KILLS WOMAN

MRS. TAMAR HANSCOM SHOT BY CLINTON SMITH WHEN SHE SPURNS OFFER.

REFUSED A MARRIAGE OFFER

Brother of Murdered Woman Grapples Smith—Police Near at Hand But Are Outwitted.

Minneapolis— Much incensed because the woman he loved refused to promise to marry him, Clinton Smith, 26 years old, 1020 Hawthorn avenue, shot and almost instantly killed Mrs. Tamar Collins Hanscom at her home, 1422 Lake street west. He escaped and the police forces of the Twin Cities are searching for him.

Roll Down Stairs.

The shooting occurred in the presence of the woman's brother, Ralph Collins. He grapled with the murderer and the two rolled down a flight of stairs leading from the third to the second floor, where Smith freed himself by striking Collins a heavy blow on the face, half stunning him. He then made his way to the alley at the foot of the stairs.

The shooting followed threats made by Smith earlier in the evening. He appeared at the home of Mrs. Hanscom and asked her whether she would not consent to marry him after she obtained a divorce from her husband, Leon Hanscom. The divorce case was to be tried early in March.

She told him "no." He threatened her, saying he would return and kill her and her family, but she paid little attention to him at first.

"Prepare to die at 11 o'clock,' he is reported to have said, "I will return then and kill you and your family."

Police Notified.

After he had left, Mrs. Hanscom telephoned the police and told them of what had occurred. Policeman Hollison was sent to watch the premises Smith did not reappear, but he telephoned several times, renewing his threats. Hollison was present when he telephoned the last time and grabbed the receiver, but Smith had left the phone. The policeman asked the chief operater where the call came from, but did not obtain the information.

Hollison was later relieved by Patrolman Rodein and Thompson. When they entered the flat they were told they were not required. They stayed near the corner, but in the meantime Smith entered by one of the three entrances leading to the flat, broke a window in the door to Mrs. Hanscom's room and demanded admittance.

Some of the glass cut Mrs. Hanscom's face and she called for help. Her brother, Ralph, went into the corridor to reason with the man. His sister followed him. Smith brushed by the brother and confronted the woman. He drew a revolver and fired point blank, when not over three feet from her.

The bullet penetrated her heart and one lung. It struck a door casing and was picked up on the floor 10 feet away.

Woman Is Calm.

Mrs. Hanscom staggered back, but said quietly, addressing her brother: "Throw him out, Ralph."

While Ralph jumped for Smith's throat, neighbors, awakened by the shot, opened their doors and John Kees was just in time to catch the body of Mrs. Hanscom in his arms as she sank over, unconscious.

With the help of Patrolman Rodein, who heard the shot, he carried her into his mother's bedroom and then called Dr. Gunderson, who has an office in the building. Nothing could be done. The woman was dead. Police started a search for the murderer.

Boy of 19 Wins Prize.

Owatonna.—Lawrence Taylor, 19-year-old boy of Medford, won the grand sweepstakes prize at the big corn show here. The prizes won by the boy are valued at over $100. H. H. Lafstad of Blooming Prairie, won the sweepstakes in the poultry show. With the attendance at the highest mark the corn show came to a brilliant close Saturday. The prize lists are not fully completed. The corn which took the honors is of a variety known as white dent and yielded enormously.

Starving Children Found.

Eveleth, Minn., Feb. 4.—Half crazed from hunger and cold, Mary Zygowski and two small children were found by Police Chief Finnegan in a pitiable condition in rooms almost bare of furniture, without fuel and with a cupful of flour as their only provisions. The rooms were over an undertaking establishment on the principal street of the city. Without food or fire for five days, their only means of protecting themselves from the cold was to remain in bed, wrapping themselves up.

Raise for Steel Employes.

Duluth, Feb. 6.—The proposed increase in wages promised at the first of the year by the United States Steel corporation has just gone into effect. President Olcott of the Oliver Mining company issued a statement saying: "Beginning Feb. 1, the Oliver Iron Mining company will make a voluntary readjustment of wages. The rates for surface labor will be advanced from $2.10 to $2.25 per day. There will be adjustments of the rates in other classifications of labor, both surface and underground."

ROAD BUILDING ERA IS SEEN

Proposed Lines Will Increase Timber Operations and Add to Settlement.

Bemidji.—Four new railroad lines, three of which will center in Bemidji, are in the forecast for this city. The proposed lines will open a vast region for timber operations and settlement.

Of the four lines the one which is considered of most importance is that which will be extended north from Kelliher to Beaudette. This line will connect the two ends of Beltrami county by a direct route, will give many boundary residents a direct route to Minneapolis, and hundreds of inland settlers an outlet for their goods, and will open other lands to settlement.

An extension of the Minneapolis & Rainy River north from Deer River to International Falls is proposed. The line now runs north thirty-five miles from Deer River to Effie, and the extension will carry it through a virgin timber country. It will be built by the Backus-Brooks interests which have bought the Minneapolis & Rainy River. The company will ship pulpwood to International Falls by rail and float sawlogs down the rivers to the Rainy river mills.

Extension of M., D. & W.

Another project is for the extension of the Minnesota, Dakota & Western, another Backus-Brooks road, west from International Falls into Beltrami county and, running north, to Beaudette and Spooner. This road has about fifteen miles in operation. It is to be built into a rich pulpwood country, so that the paper mill at International Falls will not lack raw material.

An extension of the M. & I., which is the Northern Pacific from Brainerd to Minneapolis, from Kelliher to the Minnesota, Dakota & Western line, and over that line into Beaudette, is also rumored, likewise an extension of the Wilton & Northern or the Minneapolis, Red Lake & Manitoba railroad, around the west end of the Red lakes to connect with the Great Northern lines at Roseau or Warroad. This will furnish an outlet for a well-settled country northwest of the Red lakes and will parallel the Soo through one of the richest sections of northern Minnesota.

Bemidji a Division Point.

The Great Northern has just completed a $40,000 station in Bemidji and has bought land for yards. When the line is built around the lakes, it is expected Bemidji will be made a division point between Sauk Center and Warroad, Grand Forks and Swan River. The Wilton & Northern has about twenty-five miles of track running from Bemidji to Island lake, five miles south of the Red Lake agency, and the Red Lake road has thirty-five miles of track laid from Bemidji to Radby, five miles east of the reservation.

The Minnesota and International, two-thirds of the stock of which is owned by the Northern Pacific, and which was built by the Backus-Brooks company, has a division point at Brainerd and one at Bemidji. Trains now operated to Kelliher will be run through to Beaudette from here. The line will branch at Funkley to Beaudette and International Falls. Should the Great Northern eventually acquire the Deer River-International Falls road it will have a line from Bemidji to International Falls, which has but little more mileage than the M. & I.

DRUGGISTS MAY SEE BIG ROW

Progressives and Old Line Apothecaries Have Falling Out to Be Settled at St. Paul Session.

There promises to be a fine set-to when the Minnesota Pharmaceutical Association meets in St. Paul, Feb. 18-20. Two factions of the big druggists organization are already whetting their blades for each other. They are termed by "the trade" the progressives and the old guard.

The progressives complain that heretofore state conventions have confined discussions and general convention business wholly to drugs, while in reality the druggist of today is a versatile merchant who handles everything from camera supplies to porous plasters.

The progressives wish to take up advanced business systems, popular trade getters, advertising methods and the like. They don't care a hang for a treatise on whether Belladonna leaves grow a foot long in North Carolina and only an inch long in Minnesota, or whether nux vomica comes from Cuba or the Fijis.

Heretofore the old line "apothecaries" have controlled the conventions, but this year the new blood promises to give them an interesting session, to say the least.

Warning Disregarded.

Innumerable other people came into contact with him. The young man says he knew that there was something the matter with him, but he didn't know what it was. Two thousand Duluth citizens danced at the ball. The young man picked out seven of the best looking girls present.

EX-GOVERNOR DEAD

GENERAL L. F. HUBBARD EXPIRES SUDDENLY; LEGISLATURE ADJOURNS.

FUNERAL SERVICES SATURDAY

Honored for Galant Conduct in Civil War—Pioneer Newspaper Publisher at Red Wing.

Minneapolis — General Lucius Frederick Hubbard, for five years governor of Minnesota, died suddenly late Wednesday, of last week, at the home of his son, Charles F. Hubbard, 5019 First avenue, S. About 3 p. m. he complained of not feeling well and went to his room. Death came at 5.40 p. m. Interment was private.

The funeral services took place at St. Mark's Episcopal church Saturday at 2:30 p. m. The interment at Lakewood cemetary was private.

General Hubbard observed his seventy-seventh birthday anniversary Sunday, Jan. 26. Since that day he had not been in his usual good health but his condition at no time had been considered alarming.

Both houses of the Minnesota legislature adjourned on the day of General Hubbard's funeral, a joint resolution to that effect, offered by Representative Fred Seebach, having been adopted. This action followed a special message from Governor A. O. Eberhart, calling attention to General Hubbard's death. The governor also directed that the painting of the battle of Corinth in the governor's rooms be draped. The picture shows General Hubbard leading the charge of Minnesota troops.

Aided State's Development.

General Hubbard was one of the most prominent figures in the development of the state of Minnesota. As editor, miller, railroad builder, legislator and governor he has been a leading citizen of the state since 1857, when he came to Minnesota and established the Red Wing Republican in Red Wing, Goodhue county. His services in the civil war, where he rose from the ranks of a private in the Fifth Minnesota to the rank of a brevet brigadier general, are an important chapter in the state's military history.

General Hubbard was the ninth governor of Minnesota. He was born Jan. 26, 1836, at Troy, N. Y. His father, Charles F. Hubbard, was sheriff of Rensselar county, New York. His mother was Margaret Van Valkenberg. On both sides of the family General Hubbard was of old colonial ancestry. His father died when he was three years old and his mother when he was ten. He went to live with an aunt in Chester, Vt., where he attended the district school for three years. Subsequently he attended an academy at Granville, Vt. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a tinsmith and worked at that trade in Vermont until he was eighteen, when he went to Chicago. He worked at his trade in Chicago from 1854 to 1857. He then decided to come west. Arriving at Red Wing, Minn., in July, 1857, he established the Red Wing Republican, the first number of which was printed Sept. 4, 1857. The press on which the paper was printed was taken to Red Wing from Chicago by him.

Enlisted for War.

General Hubbard issued the Red Wing Republican until the war. On Dec. 19, 1861, he enlisted in Company A, Fifth Minnesota. He was elected captain of his company, Feb. 5, 1862. His promotion was rapid. He was made lieutenant colonel March 24, 1862; colonel Aug. 31, 1862, and brevet brigadier general Dec. 16, 1864, for "conspicuous gallantry" in the battle of Nashville, Dec. 15 and 16, 1864. Among the campaigns in which General Hubbard served were the campaigns around Corinth, siege of Vicksburg, Banks' Red River campaign, Nashville, Spanish Fort and Mobile. He was wounded at Corinth and Nashville and at Nashville had three horses shot from under him. In all Governor Hubbard participated in thirteen campaigns, five sieges and thirty-four battles.

General Hubbard was mustered out of service Sept. 6, 1865. He returned to Red Wing. In 1866 he entered the grain business, subsequently adding the milling industry. In 1871 and 1873 he was elected as a republican to the state senate. In 1874 he was appointed by the legislature one of the arbitrators to settle the trouble between the state and prison contractors. He was one of the commissioners appointed by Governor Marshall to investigate the old state railroad bond situation.

General Hubbard served as governor for five years, from Jan. 10, 1882 to Jan. 5, 1887. His second term was extended to three years in connection with changes from annual to biennial sessions of the legislature.

Police Change at Mankato.

Mankato.—At a meeting of the city council Mayor Taylor announced several appointments to fill vacancies on the police force, necessitated by the shooting of Patrolman Joseph Budde at Milwaukee by an insane patient that he was taking to a sanatorium, and by the resignation of Desk Sergeant Charles Scovell and Patrolman Andrew Hovig. The new men are Patrolmen Frank Bienapfl, promoted to be desk sergeant, and Nicholas Thilgen, A. E. Carlson and J. G. Schrodt, appointed patrolmen.

Little Chance That Voice-Culture Student Attempted to Gratify Old Gentleman's Friend.

Patiently the old gentleman had been sitting through the ordeal of hearing the voice-culture student in the hall bedroom below practicing with a zeal which left no room for criticism, but with a talent by no means so kindly desribed.

Finally he crept down the stairs and rapped at the door of the young woman's room.

"I can't come in," he said in response to an invitation, "but I simply came to tell you of a friend of mine who would, I know, be willing to pay almost any amount of money to hear you sing."

Overwhelmed with joy the young woman begged the kind old gentleman to write his friend's name and address on a piece of paper.

When he had gone upstairs she looked at the slip of paper which he had handed back to her inscribed and neatly folded. It read: "John W. Jones, Asylum for the Deaf."

TWO CARBUNCLES ON NECK

Veterans' Home, Napa Co., Cal.—"I was afflicted with two carbuncles on the back of my neck. The doctors said they were the largest carbuncles he ever saw. I suffered the most intense agony, so much that I could not rest or sleep for about a month. One was lanced four times. When the first began to get better another broke out and was equally as painful as the first one. I heard of Cuticura Soap and Ointment being good for such things, so I procured a box of Cuticura Ointment and a cake of Cuticura Soap. I washed both the carbuncles with Cuticura Soap frequently whenever any pus began to gather, and applied the Cuticura Ointment. I felt relief after the first use of Cuticura Soap and Ointment, and in a week's time both carbuncles were gone and I was completely cured. I have not been troubled since.

"I also had eczema of the scalp. My scalp itched fearfully and pimples began to break out which emitted pus, and my head became sore and scaly. I had dandruff also. I used Cuticura Soap for a shampoo with hot water, and used the Cuticura Ointment on my scalp, and it afforded instant relief, followed by absolute cure." (Signed) George H. Wetsell, Dec. 11, 1911.

DOINGS OF THE SOLONS

Minnesota Legislative Affairs of the Past Week—Law Makers Hard at Work.

St. Paul, Feb. 8.—Robert C. Dunn of Princeton pulled his county assessor bill out of the fire yesterday and secured its passage in the house by a vote of 67 to 45. When the bill came up on general orders Tuesday, it was attacked in all quarters of the house and Mr. Dunn then stated to the house that he realized the sentiment of the members was against it. But he got the bill laid over, and had it made a special order at 11 a. m. yesterday. Meanwhile it developed that there was much sentiment for the bill in the country districts of the state, and the fight today was sharp.

Ramsey County Excepted.

The measures applies to all counties in the state except Ramsey, which has a county assessor under special law, but cities over 5,000 do not come under its provisions except by a three-fifths vote of the city council. The assessors are to be elected by county commissioners and their salaries are graded with some latitude allowed in each class, the amount being fixed by the county commissioners. The amount for Hennepin county would be between $3,000 and $4,500. The county assessor supersedes all town assessors, but his work is reviewable, the same as now, by the town and county boards of equalization, and finally by the state tax commission.

Sullivan's Recall Bill.

Senator George H. Sullivan's bill for a constitutional amendment creating a court of recall for judges was recommended for passage by the senate judiciary committee. The proposed new court is to be composed of judges of the supreme and district courts, as the legislature may direct. The recall court shall have power to try any judge accused of any offense worthy of impeachment, of incompetency or misconduct. The bill provides that in case of removal of a judge by this court he may still be impeached before the legislature or tried in the ordinary courts for crime. If acquitted, he may be still subject to recall by vote of the people, if any such law be passed.

St. Paul, Feb. 7.—Licenses for cigaret dealers are proposed by T. J. Greene of St. Paul in a bill sent to the house yesterday. The license fee is fixed at $50 and the tax goes to the state. If the proposition becomes a law it will repeal the present statute prohibiting the sale of cigarets and "makings" in Minnesota.

The senate today, by motion of Senator John Moonan of Waseca, decided to make his recall bill a special order for 11 a. m. Tuesday. The bill permits the recall of any official in the state, appointive or elective, providing that the successor shall be named, not at the same election, as many states do, but later in the usual manner provided by law.

Initiative and Referendum.
